Kachuck connects the public and the private in Roman culture with a third sphere, the solitary. Keith and Myers' collection contains 22 contributions organized into four parts: "Elegy in Vergil," "Vergil in Ovidian Elegy," "Vergil and Elegy in Imperial Latin Literature," and "Vergil's Elegiac Mode in Reception." Lowrie and Vinken's collection contains two chapters on Vergil: 2, "Oriental Empire: Vergil, Georgics," and 3, "Empire without End: Vergil, Aeneid, and Lucan, De bello civili." Wright considers Vergil's figuring of human spirits as bees in Aen. 8 and its literary afterlife in the work of Dante, Milton, Tennyson, Browning, C. G. Rossetti, and Michael Field, among others.

Ascenso André offers a Portuguese translation, introduction, and notes to Vergil’s works. Calloni discusses a new witness to the medieval Italian translation of the Aeneid by Ciampolo di Meo degli Ugurgieri (b. ca. 1290).

Cristóbal López translates Aen. 4 into Spanish hexameters. Espluga (in Catalan) discusses the Catalan translations of Georg. 2, in particular the sections relating to vineyards, by Llorenç Riber i Campins (1881–1958, trans. 1918) and Miquel Dolç (1912–1994, trans. 1963). Fernandes (in Portuguese) discusses three translations of Vergil’s works, along with their prefaces and notes, that were published in Brazil between 1808 and 2016. Kalb and Torlone consider the varying successes and, in the case of Vergil, the failures of Russian verse translations of Homer and of the Aeneid produced from the eighteenth through twentieth centuries. Tibaldo focuses on the partial translations of the Aeneid by the Italian poet Andrea Zanzotto (1921–2011) and the poet, novelist, and filmmaker Pier Paolo Pasolini (1922–1975). Trevizam presents the Latin text of Georg. 3 with a facing Portuguese translation by Feliciano de Castilho and Trevizam. Trudel takes as his point of departure Frédéric Boyer’s 2019 translation of the Georgics (Le Souci de la terre) and his introductory essay entitled “Faire Virgile.” Vallana discusses the Italian translation of Aen. 2 made by Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837).

Kayachev 2020b rejects Scaliger's conjecture fomes in Moret. 8 and proposes reading furnus in place of the transmitted fumus; at Moret. 45 Kayachev 2022 proposes reading et versat in place of transversat. Olszaniec 2022b endorses the conjecture o humana (first proposed by M. Lenchantin de Gubernatis) for the problematic o numantina at Ciris 408; at Ciris 90, Olszaniec 2022c conjectures nomine iam in place of omnia sim. Rodríguez-Pantoja's analysis of the text, meter, and literary allusions of the poem De est et non concludes that its authorship should be attributed to Ausonius and that this poem should not be included in the Appendix Vergiliana.

Trotz-Liboff, Leo. 2023. “Vergil’s Epicurean Fortunatus.” Classical Journal 118: 409–39.

Tomcik looks at the way Vergil reworks Aratus’s weather signs and offers a new interpretation of Georg. 1.393–97. Trotz-Liboff’s reevaluation of the relationship between the figures of the felix and the fortunatus in Georg. 2 concludes that these figures embody the physical and ethical teachings of Epicureanism.

- Spence, Sarah. 2021. “‘And in the End’: Employing Plural Agency in the Reading of the Aeneid.” Vergilius 67: 275–84.

Maslov observes that passages in the Aeneid in which stupor, stupere, and related words are used involve encounters between humans and gods and between the living and the dead. Perkell refines and expands on her earlier study of Aeneas’s leaving Creusa and Dido behind (published in H. Foley, ed., Reflections of Women in Antiquity, 1981). Sharrock focuses her attention on the often dissonant patterns that arise from the interaction of gender and social class in the Aeneid. Spence offers concluding observations on the contributions to Giusti and Rimell (2021) and on the feminine in Vergil.

Brodd argues that Aen. 6 may best be read as one would read a dream. Freitas remarks on the tragic coloring of the escape from Troy in Aen.

2, which arouses πάθος. Simons comments on the depiction of Fama at Aen. 4.173–90. Starnone (2021b) connects Venus’s statement magno Aeneae mecum teneatur amore at Aen. 1.675 with other Vergilian passages (Georg. 4.511–15, Ecl. 8.85–89) which point to erotic hierarchies built on the “symbolic order of the mother.”

Kragl 2020 discusses the contradictions, manifest primarily in characters' gestures, which contribute to the complexity of some of the characterizations in the Aeneid. The elimination of this type of characterization in the medieval Roman d'Enéas is a significant development in literary history.

Gorostidi Pi edits a funerary inscription from the first century AD consisting of a cento written in dactylic hexameters drawn from Vergil, Ovid, and perhaps Valerius Flaccus. Longobardi discusses a fourth- or fifth-century floor mosaic inscribed with a verse from the Aeneid (2.234) preserved in the Museo Archeologico di Saragozza. Velaza offers an edition of a tile from the fourth or fifth century AD on which the first three verses of the Aeneid were inscribed.

Chaudhuri identifies several previously undiscovered anagrams in Evander's speech and argues that "these wordplays represent in microcosm the composition, disintegration, and recomposition of states leading up to and including Rome itself." Conte offers a selection of case studies that illustrate the ways in which Vergil defamiliarizes language in order to elevate its style. Gehring considers two examples (Ecl. 1.68–70 and Aen. 12.727) which demonstrate a stylistic peculiarity of Vergil that is based on repetition.

Barbieri and Ottonello both discuss the possible identification of the historical poet Vergil with the Vergili addressed in Horace, Carm. 4.12. Barbieri argues in favor of the identification. Ottonello, after reviewing previous arguments, draws attention to a first-century AD inscription (CIL 6.10004) which mentions a M. Vergilius Antiochus unguentarius, but concedes that it is impossible to say with certainty that he is Horace’s Vergil. Estefanía contrasts possible intertextual sources of Vergil’s Scylla with those of the Scylla depicted by Ovid. Gagliardi analyzes a particular form of intertextuality found in the Augustan poets (Horace, Ovid, and Vergil) in which the poet transposes the verses of another poet to an event in his life. This device frequently refers to elegiac poetry and the work of Gallus. Orth interprets Propertius 4.4.1–22 in light of its hitherto insufficiently noticed but detailed imitation of Aen. 8.585–607. Wallis argues that programmatic allusions to the Aeneid can be identified in Juno’s speech in Horace, Carm.

3.3, which promote the distinct identity of Horace's lyric poetry. Werner argues that Horace, Carm. 3.2.1–12 “slyly usurps characters from Vergil's unfinished Aeneid, alluding to some of its distinctive narrative techniques, but also draws on the similes and plot structure of its Iliadic model.”

Irmici discusses the echoing at Aen. 9.184–85 of Euripides’ development of the idea that men attribute unworthy actions to the gods not out of ignorance of their nature but out of calculation (Tr. 969–90 and IT 380–91). Saad discusses the implications of the Greek lyric tradition behind the phrase solvuntur frigore membra (Aen. 1.92 and 12.951). Vespoli compares Vergil’s reworking at Aen. 8.407–13 of Argon. 3.291–95 and concludes that Vergil read a different text of Apollonius from the text accepted by modern scholars. Woodman argues in favor of the authenticity of Aen. 10.366–67 on the basis of comparison with Sallust.

Trieste.

Foster discusses the evidence in Servius’s commentary for the widening gap he perceived between “correct” Latin and the Latin used by the students of his day. Gioseffi notes that the word obsequium, never used by Vergil, is often found in the commentaries of Servius and Donatus in the context of power relationships; in Donatus the word also has an ethical value. Masselli focuses on Servius’s comments at Aen. 1.235 and 6.440–48 on a series of mythical women. Schiesaro discusses Servius’s remark, in his commentary on Aen. 4, that Dido’s deception gives to that book a style totus paene comicus. From this observation Servius draws a parallel between Vergil and the use of comic topoi in Lucretius. Stok (2020) considers the possibility that the Asinius Pollio mentioned in Servius’s commentary on the Aeneid is not the grammarian of the second century AD but the historian of the first century BC.

Conte (2020) evaluates the textual criticism of Christian Gottlob Heyne (1729–1812). Conte (2021) reviews textual variants in manuscripts of the Aeneid produced from the ninth through fifteenth centuries which may descend from an authoritative lateral textual tradition dating from late antiquity and which therefore should be considered genuine. Coroleu discusses the marginalia in the fifteenth- or sixteenth-century manuscript Barcelona, Biblioteca de Catalunya, MS 1-II-28. Dolveck considers the manuscript tradition of a group of texts that include both authentic and inauthentic Eclogues. An appendix on the tradition of the Appendix Vergiliana is given by Michael Reeve. Iurlaro provides an Italian translation and the Latin text of the Lectiois Virgilianae variae liber, ad Robertum filium by Alberico Gentili (1552–1608), with a preface and introduction in Italian. Longobardi discusses variants attested in Servius’s commentary. Morales Bernal (2021) considers interpolations in Spanish manuscripts dating from the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Morales Bernal (2022) discusses readers' notes found in two editions of Vergil's works published in Barcelona in the sixteenth century: Barcelona, Biblioteca de Catalunya, Inc-97-8°, produced by the Catalan printer Gabriel Pou; and 1-II-28, produced by the German printer Johan Rosenbach (active ca. 1470–1530). Nocchi Macedo analyzes the physical characteristics, scripts, and the historical contexts of production of the earliest extant manuscripts containing works by Vergil, Terence, Ovid, and other Latin poets. Petoletti examines the late twelfth-century manuscript Firenze, Biblioteca Laurenziana, Plut. 39.24, and its abundant fourteenth-century marginalia.

De Carlos Villamarín offers an edition of a medieval allegorical commentary on the Excidium Troiae, itself a commentary on the Aeneid, together with a translation into Italian and notes. Haynes considers how ancient and medieval commentaries on the Aeneid by Servius, Fulgentius, Bernard Silvestris, and others give us insight into four twelfth-century Latin epics: the Ylias by Joseph of Exeter, the Alexandreis by Walter of Châtillon, the Anticlaudianus by Alan of Lille, and the Architrenius by John of Hauville. Kragl (2022) challenges the analysis put forward by Jan-Dirk Müller, Episches Erzählen: Erzählformen früher volkssprachiger Schriftlichkeit (2017) of medieval epic narration as a vernacular mode that is distinct from the Vergilian tradition. The Imtheachta Áeniása discussed by LeBlanc is an Irish adaptation of the Aeneid of uncertain (eleventh through fourteenth century) medieval date. Mora presents a Latin edition of the Aeneid commentary by Bernardus Silvestris (1085–1160), together with a translation and notes in French. Simpson's analysis includes discussion of the writings of Geoffrey of Monmouth (ca. 1095–1155).

Catapano investigates the sixteenth-century reception of the "Ille ego qui quondam ..." incipit of the Aeneid. Cesaro provides a first published edition of La reina, con grave fiamma incesa, a vernacular dialogue in terza rima between Dido and Anna that is preserved in the late fourteenth-century manuscript Firenze, Biblioteca Nazionale, MS II.IV.248. Del Amo Lozano analyzes Vergilian quotations in the work of the poet and satirist Francisco de Quevedo (1580–1645). Delcorno discusses the Lenten cycle in the fourteenth- or fifteenth-century manuscript Assisi, Biblioteca del Sacro Convento di S. Francesco, MS 557, focusing on its use of Vergil's description of Aeneas's descent into the underworld. Dugaz discusses the French translation of the Aeneid by Octavien de Saint-Gelais (1468–1502). Goethals examines the explicit parody of Aen. 1–4 by the Italian satirist Pietro Aretino (1492–1556) in his account of the catastrophic sack of Rome made by Charles V in 1527. McOmish considers the Vergilian and Lucretian influences on Neo-Latin didactic poetry written in Scotland by the doctor David Kinloch (1560–1617), the educational and religious reformer Andrew Melville (1545–1622), and the academic and advocate Adam King (ca. 1560–1620). Pereira Couto discusses the pervasive Vergilian reminiscences found throughout the work of the sixteenth-century Portuguese poet and humanist Ignatius de Moraes (Inácio do Nascimento de Moraes Cardoso). Vidén writes, in Swedish, on the translation by Hélienne de Crenne (probably a pseudonym for Marguerite Briet, ca. 1510–1552) of the first four books of the Aeneid.

Calvert analyzes the Vergilian intertexts of Coopers Hill, by the English poet John Denham (1614/1615–1669), a poem whose second edition in 1640 draws on the Vergilian technique of retrospective prophecy to make its status as a commentary on the trial and execution of Charles, Earl of Stratford, more explicit. Kaptur discusses the covert allusions made by John Dryden (1631–1700) in his translations of Vergil to political circumstances following the dethronement of King James II. Lerer situates the Latin poem Ad Patrem by John Milton (1608–74) within the context of the early modern reception of Vergil. Scott discusses the use of the Aeneid as a classical colonial predecessor by William Strachey (1572–1621) in his account of the founding of the Jamestown colony in 1610.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

- Vazquez, Adriana. 2020. “The Cruellest Harvest: Virgilian Agricultural Pessimism in the Poetry of the Brazilian Colonial Period.” Classical Receptions Journal 12: 445–69.

Toscano discusses the Revolutionary War poems “To His Excellency General Washington” (1775), “On the Capture of General Lee” (1776), and “On the Death of General Wooster” (1778) written by the American poet Phillis Wheatley, who endured the Middle Passage as a young girl and was given a classical education while remaining a slave. Wheatley “obfuscates the Lucanic heart of her piece within a Vergilian body,” a strategy that allows her to “decry a movement committed both to liberty and to slavery’s perpetuation.” Vazquez examines Vergilian influences on the poetry of José Basílio da Gama (1740–95) and Inácio José de Alvarenga Peixoto (1744–93).

NINETEENTH CENTURY

Carrick-Tappeiner discusses the influence of the Dido stories as told in Aen. 4 and in Justin’s Epitome 18 on the novel Elissa; or, The Doom of Zimbabwe (1900) by Henry Rider Haggard (1856–1925). Colombo focuses on the incomplete and little-known epic poem La Gerusalemme distrutta by Cesare Arici (1782–1836), which attempts to imitate the Aeneid both thematically and stylistically. Schmitz discusses the historical novel Salammô (1862) by Gustave Flaubert (1821–80), which is set in Carthage.

Falconer, Gordon, Hickey, and O’Brien all discuss aspects of Vergil’s influence on the Irish poet Seamus Heaney (1939–2013). Fletcher casts a critical gaze on Eneas Africanus (1919), a novel about the loyal slave Eneas’s journey back to the plantation written by the American Harry Stillwell Edwards (1855–1938). After sketching the earlier twentieth-century background, Garía Jurado examines documents that reveal how Vergil was interpreted, recreated, and translated between 1976 and 1992 in Spain. Mac Góráin discusses the cultural and political reception of Vergil by the nationalist scholar, cleric, and Irish-language expert Patrick Dinneen (1860–1934). Pellicer considers Vergilian influences on works by W. H. Auden (1907–1973), William Wordsworth (1770–1850), Tom Stoppard (b. 1937), and Seamus Heaney. Pinheiro Hasegawa and Pereira Furtado reconsider the significance within Brazilian nationalism of Vergil’s words Libertas quae sera tamen (Ecl. 1.27), used by the unsuccessful 1789 separatist movement known as the Inconfidência Mineira as a motto for their proposed flag. This symbol was finally made official in 1963. Ruiz de Vergara Olmos provides an overview of twentieth-century interpretations of the Aeneid.

Cáceres and Moreno Soldevila investigate the novel El silbido del arquero (2015) by the Spanish philologist and novelist Irene Vallejo Moreu (b. 1979), a narrative mostly inspired by Aen. 4. Rea discusses the 2013 post-apocalyptic science fiction film Snowpiercer in light of its Vergilian echoes.

Bingham offers a four-page musical score for unaccompanied bass-baritone voice, which was commissioned by the Royal Academy of Music as part of the 200 Pieces project. The score takes inspiration from Dickens' "Christmas Carol," Shakespeare's "Hamlet" and "Othello," the poetry of the Scotsman

James Thomson (1834–82), and the works of Vergil. Curbet focuses on Vergil as he is depicted in the illustrations of Dante’s Commedia by William Blake (1757–1827). Frick considers the work of the German humanist Sebastian Brant (1457/1458–1521) and the Alsatian poet Thomas Murner (1475–ca. 1537). A drawing of Dante and Vergil by Bartolomeo Passerotti (1529–1592) in the Louvre, Département des arts graphiques, inv. 8471, is the subject of Ghirardi’s study. Karas considers the painting The Death of Camilla by the Black American painter Bob Thompson (1937–66) and the influence of a drawing by the French painter Nicolas Poussin (1594–1665). Thompson represents Camilla “as collateral damage of the sort of nation building that necessitates interracial conflict.” Long contemplates the significance of the illustrations of the Eclogues on a ninth-century flabellum (liturgical fan). Zolli discusses the bronze Horse Head by the Italian sculptor Donatello (ca. 1386–1466) preserved at the Palazzo Carafa in Naples and its legendary attribution to Vergil.
