VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1998–1999

Alexander G. McKay

The present survey of Vergilian scholarship is the thirty-seventh in the Vergilius series. Classical World 68:1 (1974), published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my “Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographic Survey, 1964–1973.” The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, Walter Donlan ed. (New York and London: Garland 1978). Subsequent reviews have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973) to 44 (1998).

This 1998–1999 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and cooperation of two libraries in particular: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University, and The Robarts Library of the University of Toronto. Notices, offprints, and facsimiles of articles, chapters, and titles have been generously provided by authors and subscribers. Scholars, authors, editors, and publishers are cordially invited and encouraged to send material and advice to:

The Perseus Project provides Vergil's Eclogues, Georgics, and Aeneid in English and Latin and the Aeneid commentaries of Servius (Latin only) and Conington-Nettleship-Haverfield. Latin texts can be displayed without links to the Morpheus forms analyser, and in the case of the epic, to the commentaries as well, English texts with links to the Perseus look-up tool. The Vergil Project is officially under construction until Fall 2000, but it is functional already. It offers (1) on-line tools for disambiguation of grammar, analysis of syntax, translation, and entry of discursive commentary for individual words, phrases, or longer sections of text. Access to these tools is available upon request to qualified collaborators working individually or in groups; (2) Text and Commentary. The site currently offers a Latin text of the Aeneid based on the editions of Mynors and Geymonat, grammatical and syntactical analysis, and glossary of Aeneid 1–2; and a concordance. By December 1999 these resources will have been supplemented with grammatical and syntactical analysis and glossary of Aeneid 4 and 6, and discursive commentary on books 1, 2, 4, and 6. Virgil.org maintains a web site devoted to Vergil and Vergiliana. It is the home of "Mantovano", a threaded discussion list devoted to "the works attributed to Publius Vergilius Maro," "Commentary on Virgil and his works from late antiquity .. to the present," and "Virgil's influence on subsequent literature." The website contains a form through which one can register for "Mantovano" as well as sections on bibliography, vitae, Augustus, (Julius) Caesar, translations, links, books, maps, etc.

Munari's monograph is a reprint of the 1944 original, edited by A. Cavazere, and with an introduction by S. Timpanaro (ix–xxxviii). Paoletta argues for Anser as author, post 38 BCE. Yardley examines echoes of Vergil in Justin's Epitome of (Pompeius) Trogus and suggests that the epitomator is likely responsible for them.

49. Walter Wimmel. "Vergils Tityrus und der perusinische Konflikt. Zum Verständnis der 1. Eclogue," RhMus 141 (1998) 348–362.

Harrison argues that Corydon is a "speaking name" (Gk. κορυδών "lark"). Ergo, "the Lark has been the lark for us", an acknowledgment of Corydon's expert singing. Henderson weighs the main sectors of Eclogue 3, a mime about representation, a rumination on the spark of collaborative energy: Bickering (1–27), Bargaining (28–54), Balladeering (60–107), Balloting (55–59, 108–111), and Browsing: et quisquis (109). Papanghelis shows that Damoetas and Menalcas, from a Neoteric viewpoint, give contrasting but complementary aspects of the spirit and rhetoric of their literary circle. The exchanges of lines 84–91 are central and excite Palaemon's declaration of a draw. Literary self-consciousness is the ultimate test of the merits of the Vergilian herdsman-poet. Daphnis' judgment matches the fairness of Palaemon's: Corydon presented the better claim to superiority. Touratier examines different tenses in Ecl. 7, 1–20. Wimmel provides a specific and plausible context for the first Eclogue.

Schork detects three etymological allusions in the Georgics involving ancient Egyptian in a congenial wordplay: Georgics 4.208–121, 291; 3.28–29. Thomas regards the Georgics as a melding or integration of Hesiodic themes, maybe stylizations of agricultural folk elements, rustic Italian material, and new learned Alexandrian and Roman elements for modernity and new metaphorical meaning (213). The “rustic” or “archaic” elements undergo modernization, without loss of identity. “Songs of Hesiodic Greece, mediated through the refinement of Alexandrian Greece, would be appreciated by Vergil’s audiences.”

Bartsch demonstrates that art works in the epic excite differing and ambiguous interpretations that may even undermine the overt message of the epic. Brugnoli's launches his study of the Idaean fleet at Aeneid 9, 80–102. De Callatay detects numerical links and central focus in Aeneid 1, 257–296 (18+3+19), 6, 756–886 (61+7+63), and

8. 630–728 (48+4+47). The names at the center are: Romulus, Brutus, and Augustus respectively, the paragons of the regal, republican and imperial eras. Foucher's study of aristeiai is eye-opening. Manetti tests grammar and structure in the Sibylline responses. Miles' study of the Aeneid as a foundation myth sets the ktisis in the context of Vergil's world. Starks accents Vergil's intention to divest his readers of preconceptions regarding Carthage (and to some degree, Rome), to banish the stigma of nationality in the Dido episode by devious means.

Perkell treats the first appearance of some conventional epic features (proem, simile, speech etc.) to show how they establish the epic’s themes “while subtly complicating its generic affiliation” (26). Bleisch identifies Aras (“altars”, “curses”) as an instance of “translation with paranomasia” (O’Hara), punning etymology. Latentia in 108 alerts readers to look for hidden meanings, and the repetition of saxa highlights the double entendre of the proper name. The locale? the Altars of the Philaeni near the Greater Syrtis, or the Sicilian “Altars”. Morwood argues that Menenius Agrippa is a better candidate for Vergil’s pious statesman than Cato the Younger. Shakespeare’s Menenius Agrippa, whom, he derives from North’s Plutarch, Coriolanus) calms the rampant mob memorably at the outset of Coriolanus (1.1.49–55) and with “Vergilian” suggestion: a man of piety with a record of service to the state, truly gravis meritis (Aen. 1.151). Putnam offers a detailed critique of Aen. 1.453–493 and treats the influence which the passage exerts in the evolving epic. Homer’s Odyssey 8 was Vergil’s primary model. Johnson considers the “counter-epical” hero’s dedication to others and his endurance of pain as a paradigm of humanity while the narrator questions the moral meaning of victory and history. Clark confronts visus adesse (Aen. 2.270–271) and argues for the objective existence of Hector’s ghost: translate “Lo! in my dream, I saw Hector standing there most sorrowful.” Hexter assesses the New

Troy of book 3, derivative and lifeless, in a discussion of problems attaching to imitation, creation and innovation for Vergil and for Augustus. Gibson emphasises recurring motifs of hospitium, blindness, and prophecy in three episodes in book 3 (13–68, 209–269, and 588–683). Echoes of punitive blinding in Greek myth impact on the metaphorical blindness of the Trojans who remarkably fail to see their divine mission as protoRoman heroes. Stubbs traces the harpies from wind-deities, to repulsive birds of prey, to Vergil's birds of ill omen and prophecy, playing out a mockery of common oracular instruction to intending emigrants. books 3 and 5 are not universally admired, but Stubbs seeks to reinstate them by reason of their valuable stories, their relevance to the plot, their successful blend of paradigms, and their relevance to the pattern of the epic. Spence is concerned with Dido, Vergil's most impressive, memorable character, Aeneas' implacable Junonian enemy, fondatrice of Carthage. Jacobson offers an alternative understanding of stirpem et genus omne futurum: "train (exercete) our offspring and future generations (Tyrians) in hatred." The exhortation to Hannibal as a youth inevitably comes to mind. Khan argues that particular images associated with Dido (Maenad, Pentheus, Orestes) indicate that she is an unsuitable partner for Aeneas. Dyson speculates that the original line was: haec ubi dicta, locum capiunt, simul ultima signat, not signoque repente, a slippage perpetuated by Mynors. Farrell studies problems of literary affiliation in Aeneid 5; he questions the Bloomian model for the relationship of Vergil to Homer and the reliability of conventional formulations of male superiority for the entire epic. Leach plants Aeneas' confrontation with Daedalus' temple doors, the Underworld pageant and the Gates of Sleep in the context of aesthetic and moral acculturation. Feldherr notices that Aeneas' quest and discovery in the Underworld mirrors techniques used by Romans in producing their "Inventories of the World." The locus where Dido and Aeneas meet frustrates any objective description of it in the epic itinerary of Aeneas, and "the epic texture of Vergilian narrative is complicated by...elements from other poetic genres that inject contrasting possibilities for interpreting the episode." (87). Fuzier grapples with the Ceryneian Hind: aeripes (Aen. 6.802), "airy-footed" or "bronze-footed"? Williams endeavours to answer questions about Aeneid 5: Why the storm, and why Drepanum? Is there internal coherence to book 5, and does any hypothetical internal theme have any relation to other books of the epic? Parallels between the Aeneid and the Argonautica are abundant and Cybele is an essential ingredient: The ship race and the Lusus Troiae are related to Cybele; both look back to Ida and on to Aeneas and Rome (27). The Lusus Troiae and the metamorphoses of the ships together mark the transformation of Trojans into Romans. Kyriakidis provides a sophisticated, new and provocative “reading” of the boundaries of book 6, the final lines of book 5 and the initial lines of book 7. Questions are posed and answers provided for the prominence of Palinurus and the Sirens, and of Caieta and Circe. Kyriakidis senses their relevance to the poet’s poetic discourse at the epic’s centre. Erato highlights poetic not erotic matters; the abandonment of previous poetic practices and themes for a Roman epic within the norms or frame of the epic tradition. Kohn argues against an interruption of Anchises’ speech by his son (o pater). Anchises forges on, invoking Jupiter.

Mack discovers a subnarrative of female presence below the level of epic plot; it complicates and enriches Vergil's picture of early Italy. Boyle accents Vergil's invitation to opposed readings in Aeneid 8: the slaying of Cacus and the version of Roman history on the shield prompt simultaneously opposed ways of reading Roman victory. Tronson argues that Cleopatra's twin asps (Aen. 8.697) may be a product of Octavian's propaganda. Fulgentius adopted and perpetuated the notion in his sixth-century World History, and so on to Shakespeare. Wiltshire ponders unepic features of Aeneid 9 and the grief that attaches to the costs of war. Kraggerud reacts to instances where critics have posited allusions running counter to the surface meaning of the text, sensing an alien, sometimes even subversive "voice": Aen. 4.460, 4.412, 8.394, and 4.149. Kraggerud also discusses problems of text, punctuation and interpretation in book 9: 51, 85, 91, 130, 140–142, 230, 239, 243, 363, 391–394, 481–482, 599, 709, 733, 764, and 789. Boyd complements Pharr's Aeneid 1–6 with the new AP readings in books 10 and 12. She provides introductions for each section, notes and vocabulary on the same pages, and a complete vocabulary. Feeney examines the aesthetic of battle books, particularly the attraction of violence, graphically related for epic readers. The traditional epic catalogue gains unusual meaning in Vergil's usage. McKay and Hornsby produce another text / workbook for High School and College students. It contains the newly prescribed AP texts for the Advanced Placement (AP) Vergil examination, with Introductory Discussion, Grammatical Notes and Vocabulary, student questions, sight translation passages, poetic terms, and two essays offering advice by AP examiners on how to write a precise literal translation, and on writing the Vergil AP essays. McKay's Companion Resource volume is designed for teachers, college instructors and students, and provides an Introduction to Vergil's Iliadic Aeneid, an essay on Latin Metrics and the dactylic hexameter, literal translations, suggested answers to the student questions, and a Selective Critical Bibliography of monographs, chapters, and articles in English relating to Aeneid 10 and 12 and to the entire epic. Anderson highlights exceptional aspects of the Camilla episode; Vergil's evident respect for the bellatrix virgo prompts fresh perspectives on the epic's female agents. Camilloni's discussion includes Casmilla / Camilla. Baron's paper uses Ernest Lawrence Thayer's "Casey at the Bat" as a paradigm for Aeneas' dilemma at the close of the epic. Baron aims to heighten the humanity of Aeneas and to make the vexed ending of the epic palatable and meaningful to students. Huskey's article highlights the projectile which Turnus throws at Aeneas (Aen. 12, 896–907). The Homeric parallel (Iliad 5.302ff.) where Diomedes breaks Aeneas' leg with a stone, resurfaces, figuring Aeneas as hero capable of defeating a second Diomedes in Turnus; the other "ring" structure begins in book 1 where Aeneas surfaces amidst Aeolus' act of desecration, and reappears in the colossal boundary stone (12.896–900) with religious connotations, particularly those of Terminus. Finally, Aeneas punishes Turnus according to law, and the dilemma is solved on a spiritual level. Jacobson alerts readers to the allusive force in the controversial violaverit (12.67); its meaning of "taint, spoil, defile" may be tempered by association with violare, "to render crimson, to color," aptly followed by roses and lilies (68–69). Lateiner, inter alios / alias accents Lavinia, stressed by conflicting desires and duties, the conflict of familial and national pieties with her personal inclinations. Turnus responds in his own manly way, with non-verbal expressions of confusion and affection (gaze-lock, haste). Noonan analyses the medical episode and examine links between the medico-lapyx healers and other remedies from medical tales in Greek myth and mythography. Noonan argues that the episode, 12.391–429, reflects Vergil's antiquarian research into medical lore which he imagined was more "primitive" than medical lore in Homer. The final battle in Aeneid 12, according to Reed, reprises in microcosm the whole war, and prefigures the Battle of Actium. Trojan Thymbraeus slays Rutulian Osiris, an event with semantic richness that “draws and redraws the lines between identity and alterity, pinpointing the epic’s struggle to define what it is to be Roman” (415) The slaying of Osiris...emblemizes both the whole mission of Aeneas and the achievement of Augustus” (399). Putnam’s study of Aeneid 12 centers on the exchange of furor and sympathy between Aeneas and Turnus before the curtain falls.

De Grummond’s thesis is that Vergil conceived images of the moon and the chase and of Diana as variants of single motif, mutable in its repetitions, constituting a central theme in the epic. Coolness and reticence, withdrawal into one's self, flight from society, united with a longing for companionship and fulfilment offered by human fellowship are components of what De Grummond calls the "Diana experience." The Camilla and Nisus and Euryalus episodes feature in the discussion. Khan studies the portrait and political significance of Polyphemus, symbolic of gigantomachic, anti-Jovian forces set against Aeneas' mission and its culmination in the Augustan order. Achaemenides is dehumanised by the monster, while virtuous Anchises, creature of fides and pietas, of philanthropy and clemency, fosters exemplary concord with erstwhile foes in the Augustan mode. Nugent focuses on the difference between male and female suffering and moral choice in the epic. Spence explores the ambiguity of Pallas (divine and mortal) in the epic, and suggests that Pallas Minerva evidences traits of Pallas Athena in Aeschylus' Eumenides. Her final paragraph is memorable: "At the end of the poem, Turnus is sacrificed to Pallas, and his groan places his spirit arguably beneath the earth where he and Camilla will enrich the soil of Rome as the Augustan Eumenides" (161). Weber suggests that both Dido and Circe, overcome by love, are entitled to be called "golden." Aurea, generally recognized as ablative and spondaic by synezesis, may be read preferably as nominative.

Dangel's study treats prayers and epitaphs in Vergil and Catullus. Gill (no. 168) accents the contrast between the Aristotelian approach to the emotions and the Stoic, shared by the Hellenistic schools of philosophy, notably Epicureans. Roman poetry tends to present intense passion as a kind of madness, in Seneca and Vergil especially; passion is viewed as the outcome of akratic (weak-willed) self-surrender, a portrayal best explained as a fusion of Stoic psychology and Roman ethics. Gordon establishes Lucretius' DRN as a model in Aeneid 1 and 4, together with Homer's Odyssey and Apollonius Rhodius' Argonautica. Echoes of Nausicaa and other Phaeacian traditions reinforce Dido's link with the Garden. Disparagers of Epicurus called him the "Phaeacian philosopher." Finally, the inter-textual modes of the epic consign various possibilities of interpretation to the reader. The "Groupe" applies modern stylistic criticism to the characterization of Ajax in Ennius, Vergil, Lucan, Silius Italicus, and Homer. Helzle concentrates on the speeches of Dido, Turnus, and Aeneas. Johnston argues that philology and archaeology suggest a transition of divine power at Cumae from Hera / Juno to Apollo. The Hera association appears in the Sibyl "Herophile" ("dear to Hera") known to Varro and Tibullus, and in an oracular disk from the locale. McKay's address to the Pittsburgh Graduate Student Conference on "Representations of Philosophy in the Classical World" studies Epicurean traits in the Bucolics and Aeneid. Wright argues that an Aristotelian attitude is more pervasive in the epic than a Stoic one, and that by Aristotelian standards Aeneas' anger is presented no more favorably than that of Turnus.

Dognini argues that Vergil had serious reservations about Julius Caesar. Levi's Life offers fresh, personal insights into familiar material.

Fantham's Fasti Book IV retells the legend of Trojan Aeneas; then introduction and commentary provide general background and explanations of his historical and religious material. Francese constructs a profile of Parthenius as a learned literary collaborator with Cornelius Gallus, Cinna (?) and Vergil. He offered advice and example as a scholar poet rather than schoolmaster. Jenkyns explores ideas of nature throughout antiquity, but particularly Vergil's including landscape, history and patriotism in the discussion. Jenkyns is concerned with the poetry and culture of the first century BCE as a whole. Keith studies Sulpicia's six elegies which regularly evoke the love story of Dido and Aeneas, redeploying the diction and recombining Vergilian themes and imagery. Sulpicia's multifaceted, thoroughly distinctive female persona enables the her to invoke a complex of erotic desires, sensations, fears and satisfactions. "Sulpicia's poetry compels our recognition of tensions among competing ideological positions in the construction of sexuality and gender in Augustan Rome — too rarely glimpsed in the male-authored literature of her contemporaries." Lightfoot's newly edited text of the Hellenistic poet and mythographer provides a translation, commentary, and contextual study of Parthenius' works, including the poetic fragments and love stories. Vergil's Daedalus reverberates in Pavlock's article on his Ovidian presence.

Adams and Mayer review the contents of the Proceedings of the British Academy volume 93 (1999) devoted to “Aspects of the Language of Latin Poetry” under separate rubrics: Neutral Terms, Prosaic Terms, Formal Speech or Prose, Colloquialism and Orality, Archaism, The Influence of Greek, Metaphor, and Word Order; Hyperbaton. Adams deals with the relationship between ordinary usage and certain “poetic” patterns. Coleman surveys the concepts of poetic diction, discourse, and register, including archaism and the debt to Greek, including the use of metaphor and specifically poetic syntax. Görler’s article bears on unexpected usages of transitive verbs which may amount to metaphor. Langslow deals with scientific language, Mayer with the influence of Greek and the use of technical vocabularies. Novara is concerned with tibicines: Aeneid 1.534, 7.258, 1.560. Penney’s focus is on syntactic features that derive from the oldest stratum of Latin usage.

236. Jeffrey Wills. "Divided Allusion: Virgil and the Coma Berenices." HSCP 98 (1998) 277–305.

Balot refines and extends Wilkinson's Pindaric reading of the proem with specific, neglected parallels between Vergil and Octavian. Putnam analyzes Aeneid 12.896–900 for allusions, divine manipulation and the nature of heroism in the interplay of Homer and Vergil. "Aeneas' enraged slaying of his suppliant antagonist...runs blatantly counter to his father's ennobling dictum to spare the humbled foe (and) does not augur well for a sustained future, in his hands, of heroism as we know it from Homer and as Anchises movingly commands its moderation for Rome to come" (78). Wills studies Catullus 66.39 and Vergil, Aeneid 6.456 and questions why the imitation is so close, and seeks to determine the boundaries of the allusion.

243. J. J. L. Smolenaars. "The Vergilian Background of Seneca's Thyestes 641–682." Vergilius 44 (1998) 51–65.

Giovini studies Vergilian echoes in the Saxon poetess Rosvita (AD 935–1000) and in the account of Lamberto's death (AD 892). Harrison detects detailed, subtle readings and imitations of Vergil in Apuleius' Metamorphoses. The deployment of Vergilian imitation is not designed to parade learning but to inject humor and to accent the "lower tone" of Apuleius' text. Smolenaars' study of the Tantalid palace (locus horridus) reveals thematic and intertextual references to Homer's cave of Polyphemos, Vergil's Cumaean Temple of Apollo and the Descent to Hades in Vergil's book 6. The recollection of Vergil's catabasis and echoes of Latinus' palace in book 7 may offer a reflection on contemporary Neronian politics Billanovich examines "Un libro del ragazzo Petrarca" (129–136); Venier studies "Additamenta danielini nel Virgilio di Petrarca" (137–147). Spence suggests that Augustine's conversation with his mother, Confess. 9.10. 23–25, may evoke the topos of the gates of horn and ivory. The gates gain importance and significance in mediaeval Christian literature: they mediate between life and the newly-determined hereafter.

Tudeau-Clayton treats the mediation of Virgil the poet and his texts in early modern England, and its impact on Jonson, and particularly on Shakespeare's The Tempest.

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY WRITERS

267. Richard Morton. "Bringing Virgil over into Britain: John Dryden Refigures Aeneid 1–5." Studies in Eighteenth Century Culture 27 (1998) 147–167.

Morton argues that Dryden's overt teaching imposed on his Aeneids may be his doctrines of exile, invasion, and usurpation or be the identification of Aeneas with William III. Morton's verdict is impressive: "...the power of his version relies in the consistently imposed moral vision: a voice committed to its ethical beliefs" (167).

278. M. Vicario. "Virgil's 'Tenth Eclogue' and Shelley's 'Adonais.'" Keats-Shelley J. 47 (1998) 161–183.

Graver supplies Wordsworth's translations of Aen. 1–3; 4.688–692; 8.337–366; Geo. 4.511–515. Wordsworth favored Pope's rhythm: couplets or triplets. "Italia! shouts Achates: round and round / Italia flies with grateful rebound, / from all who see the coast, or hear the happy sound." Ronnick shows that Adams' eloquent attacks on slavery were fuelled by Vergil. Stray traces the decline of the Classics in England to a marginalized academic subject.

288. R. G. Weigel. "Antiquity as Motif and Theme in Hermann Broch's Der Tod des Vergil." MAL 31 (1998) 143–145.

Arkins recalls the hoaxers McAuley and Stewart who concocted a poetic pastiche "The Darkening Ecliptic" (1943) and paraded it as a modern Australian masterpiece (for a while), seasoned with a dash of Purcell's Dido and Aeneas. Huxley recalls an inept Vergilian quotation (in English) and faulty recollection by a respected British statesman-classicist in 1968. Mazzoli explores Ungaretti's transformation of Palinurus' epic experience into a dramatic adventure of the mind which through death recovers the "memory" of the "innocent place," the promised land. Murgatroyd introduces our epic hero to an "accidental" dental experience in hilarious Latin verse
