VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1999–2000

Alexander G. McKay

The present survey of Vergilian scholarship is the thirty-eighth in the Vergilius series. Classical World 68:1 (1974) published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my “Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographic Survey, 1964–1973.” The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, Walter Donlan ed. (New York and London: Garland 1978). Subsequent reviews have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973) to 45 (1999)

This 1999–2000 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and co-operation of two libraries in particular: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University, and The Robarts Library, University of Toronto. Notices, offprints, and facsimiles of articles, chapters, and titles have been generously supplied by authors and subscribers. Scholars, authors, editors, and publishers are cordially invited and encouraged to send material and advice to:

Cairns argues that Buc. 1.1–2 contain an etymology attested by and probably derived from Artemidorus, and that Italian "Doric" suits a Theocritean program. Faber argues that the image of the turner's chisel (tornus 3.38) in the ekphrasis of the cups reinforces the metaphorical meaning of Buc. 3.35–43, functions as a metaphor for poetic composition in general, and advances the positive programmatic statement of Vergilian pastoral. Fernandelli examines analogues between Homer, Odyssey 12 and Vergil, Aeneid 3; both recount passages through events, in fact and in story.

Conte’s article, elegantly translated by Elaine Fantham, examines Vergil’s masterly grafting of “the grand experiences of drama” onto epic, and insists that “the canonical power of the model required that the ‘imitator’ should be ‘Homerikotatos,’ ‘as Homeric as possible,’ in order to embody him in a new voice” (29). The evocation of Homer “guaranteed a synthesis between the new ‘sentimental’ style and the (lost) ‘naivete’ of the archaic, between the freedom of the new critical reasoning and the apparently simple necessity of the mythical world of heroes, producing a new, richer and more complex unity" (32). Finally, "once Homeric 'naivete' is lost Virgil is more free, but also more complex: the divided language of drama is paradoxically his instrument for attaining a modern synthesis, a new world-order" (34). Aeneas plays a double role: as character, with a personal voice and relative truth, and as protagonist, embodying an absolute and objective truth. Lloyd senses a homoerotic relationship between Evander and Anchises, and a homoerotic component in Aeneas' relationship with Pallas. Vergil's language in Evander's speech (Aen. 8.152–74), analysed and paired with its epic antecedent, Apollonius, Arg. 2.751–814, accents the dynamic of "amor" and power in Roman male relationships. Stahl explore anti-Greek sentiment in the epic, a factor underscored by Anchises' remarks on L. Aemilius Paullus (Aen. 6.838–40). Augustan propagandized and monumentalized "revenge" for Troy's destruction by the insidious Greeks in political rhetoric and literature, and in construction at the revitalized site. "Es war Aeneas' Nachfahr Augustus, der Minervas angeblich von den homerischen Griechen geschandeten Tempel in Troja wiederaufbaute und damit seinerseits, wie sein Dichter Vergil, die protojanische und antigriechische ideologische Note kräftig erklingen liess" (272).

Smith argues that Vergil shaped the Sinon-Laocoon episode to be a story of the systematic perversion of religious sacrifice that turns inevitably on the perversion of human knowledge. Homer generally treated the last two feet of the epic verse as an unbroken rhythmical unit. Pontes shows that the Aeneid resorts frequently to sense-breaks, attested by ancient punctuation, within the heroic clausula. He considers the rhetorical and poetic effect of the 'broken' heroic clausula in Aeneid 2 and 3.. Casali tracks ambiguity and complexity in Dido's address to Aeneas (Aen. 4.416–36) and explores the implications of her request for tempus inane: did Aeneas make a mistake? Warden supplies a detailed discussion of correspondences and contrasts in passages that precede the crossing , and those that relate to the crossing and what lies beyond.

Gomez Pallares links the basic meaning of latro (Aen. 12.1–8) (an armed man who stalks and wounds his victim) with the popular Roman board game (ludus latrunculorum) where military strategy was basic. Hahn studies Vergil's transformation of an Homeric ritual, specifically associated with a treaty oath, into an ambiguous ritual more reminiscent of an ordinary sacrifice. Hahn follows Servius who detected a Roman preparatory measure rather than Greek sacrificial practice in Aen. 12.173–74.

Fantham's study of Turnus' role in the council debate (Aeneid 11) and in the battle episodes from his triumph in Aeneid 10 to his death, sets Turnus in a more compassionate light; Vergil's depiction of the resistance hero's weakness, and his absorption with an egocentric quest for glory, nevertheless retains our pity for the defeated hero. Papaioannou demonstrates that Vergil transformed the mentality and behaviour of Diomedes in Homeric epic and incorporated his transformation in the new intellectual milieu of the Augustan age. Diomedes has no enemy, and no rival in Patavium; his destiny foreshadows Aeneas' cultural integration. Smith accents Vergil's use of Achilles as nuanced figure, central to an understanding of the epic poem and its hero. Achilles, on the testimony of Aeneas, Priam, and Neptune, emerges not simply as a symbol of violence but as a more complex figure embodying wrath and pietas. Just as Achilles shares Aeneas' pietas, so Aeneas shares Achilles' destructive nature.

Nadeau asks why Vergil chose not to imitate an important feature of his models, the Homeric epics who supplied explicit accounts of the deaths of Achilles and Odysseus. The Ivory Gate is reconsidered, along with parallel and contrasting "Vergilian" themes in Ovid's Metamorphoses. Dyson argues that Lavinia's blush (Aen. 12.64–71) repeatedly inspired Ovid (Metamorphoses) no less than Turnus: the blush becomes a defining motif for Ovid's Song of Orpheus.

Bell argues that Vergil’s epic verses are as solicitous of popular favor as of learned connoisseurship. Vergil makes his poem speak directly in a “popularis” manner to all who had seen the political “advertisements.” Gladiatorial imagery, which surfaces in the combat scenes, was familiar to all ranks of Roman society. The late Don Paul Fowler leaves his collected articles as legacy; they are abiding memorials of a learned, provocative scholar and mentor. Gladiatorial imagery, which surfaces in the combat scenes, was familiar to all ranks of Roman society. Pinkster analyses Vergil’s use of the present tense for narrative events in the epic, while retaining traces of the features familiar in oral story telling. “Difficulties in explaining the use of the present disappear, when we adopt a broader view of the functions the present fulfils in the Latin tense system.” Thomas’ collection of his articles and notes, published between 1979 and 1998, treats the poet’s transformation and renovation of his intertextual models, with emphasis on Callimachus. Thomas’ response to R. K. Balot’s article “Pindar, Virgil, and the Proem to Georgic 3,” Phoenix 52 (1998) 83–94 occupies pages 9–10, footnote 13.

Clark argues for the likelihood that Vergil took Aeacus' speech (Vat. gr. 2228, f. 482) and Euripidean function as model for Charon's speech (Aen. 6.388–97) and created an innovative psychological dynamic for Charon. Faber brings the pseudo-Hesiodic Shield of Heracles into conjunction with Aeneas' shield. The allusions recall dreadful imagery unique to the shield of Heracles and so intensify the destructive power of Aeneas' armor, for not only the shield, but greaves, breastplate and sword are portrayed in language borrowed from Heracles' shield.

Morton discusses Jean Regnaud de Sgrais’ translation of the Vergilian epic into French verse (1668–1681) which proposed to be what Vergil would have written if he had been a subject of “nostre glorieux Monarque” (Louis XIV). Changes to motivation and events, noted in de Sgrais’ historicist annotations, are designed to accommodate 17th-century sensibilities.

Todd's article sheds new light on the context of Enoch Powell's immigration speech in Birmingham, England in April 1968, "one of the most notorious usages of a classical quotation in 20th century British political life." Todd augments the observations of H. H. Huxley in Vergilius 44 (1998) 24–27. Williams studies the forty lines of Heaney's poem "Exposure" for reflections of essential elements of the Aeneid. Unlike Aeneas, the hero of Heaney's poem cannot see and recognize his comet, and so is unable to fulfill his destiny.

Finley discusses and reproduces eleven pictures by Turner that are "either directly or indirectly concerned with the hero, Aeneas, and his exploits." Heuze studies Vergil "portraits" in the Sousse (Hadrumetum) mosaic and in Signorelli's "Dantesque" portrait in the marble intarsia flooring of the Duomo of Siena. Kilpatrick counters Christiane Joost-Gaugier's 1999 interpretation of the Giorgione-Titian painting as evocative of Vergil's Arcadian melancholy. He detects Propertius in the elegant lute-player in red and Horace in the rustic figure gazed upon by Euterpe, with the Sabine farm in the distance.
