VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 2000–2001

Alexander G. McKay

The present survey of Vergilian scholarship is the thirty-ninth in the Vergilius series. Classical World 68:1 (1974) published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my “Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographic Survey, 1964–1973.” The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, Walter Donlan, ed. (New York & London: Garland, 1978). Subsequent reviews have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973) to 46 (2000). The 2000–2001 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and co-operation of two libraries in particular: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University, and The Robarts Library, University of Toronto. Notices, off prints, and facsimiles of articles, chapters, and titles have been generously supplied by authors and subscribers. Scholars, authors, editors and publishers are cordially invited and encouraged to send material and advice to:

Van Sickle argues that Vergil's "program" in Bucolic 1 revises Theocritus' Idyll 7 and proclaims a new bucolic departure. Landscape, postures, sorts of musical art, and names have traditional, quasi-mythical status. V. uses these mythemes to fashion a new poetic myth, with several analogues and two programmatic plots. Henderson's study of Eclogue 9 is rib-tickling and perceptive.

Heckel's study of the function of military and political language in the Georgics sheds fresh light on the contexts and implications of the verse treatise on agriculture. McDonough juxtaposes Vergil's Georgics and the Book of Revelation to good effect. Llewelyn Morgan's Patterns of Redemption continues to win enthusiastic responses from the critics. Sabine Schafer's study assesses the role of Lucretius in the development of Vergil's world view.

Mazzocchi's analysis of the war narrative in the epic, with the lists of the dead, is thorough and provocative. Perutelli's "profile" of Eduard Norden's impressive scholarship on the epic portrays the savant in his contemporary world. Ricottilli's study of gesture and word expands Highet's magisterial study of the speeches in Vergil. Ernst Schmidt's articles, particularly on "American and German Approaches," a veritable "battlefield" of contrasting approaches and views, strains to accent the humanitas and comprehensive nature of Vergil's Weltgedicht. "He wrote the Aeneid to bring to light fundamental questions of humanity, foremost among them the relation and antagonism of state and empire, that is, power and historical mission, on the one hand; and on the other, human happiness, that is, a life free of sacrifice, suffering, and guilt" (171). Victor Udwin moves audaciously as champion of comparative and interdisciplinary approaches to texts. In his view, “In combination, the terms ‘epic’ and ‘culture’ will refer specifically to the ‘understandings’ according to which that practice would have been meaningful” (11). Texts, for Udwin, served to transmit and reinforce “understandings”, specifically, the acceptability of the duel under certain circumstances.

Adkin accents accedo (Aen. 1.195–202), with its suggestion of "attachment and alliance," and accersit at Aen. 5.746, implying "assistance," as another instance of Vergil's etymologizing craft. Brucia argues that Harpalyce, who surfaces in the Venus episode at Carthage, ominously conflates the essence of two women: a fast-tracking warrior princess, and a rape-victim, a child-killer metamorphosed into a bird. Celaeno, the Harpy, provides another awesome party, and a measure of word-play in the Strophades. Abbott is concerned with Coroebus' stratagem (2.370–434) and his defence of "just deceit." In fact, the recurring nexus of dolus, arma, and civil strife (furor) reveals that dolus is malus. Anderson and Davis shed light on the vexed tradition of the Wooden Horse: both articles are noteworthy for their learning and innovative approach. Scafoglio reviews the controversial Helen episode and argues for ultrici flamma at 587 as preferable to ultrici flammae. Clement's article highlights the Breughellesque that surfaces in Vergil's epic. Konstan organizes Catullus (66.39–41), Aen. 6.460, Callimachus, Sophocles' Antigone, and testor/testa, to resolve the pun. Smith suggests that Nero's Decursio sestertii (ca. A.D. 62–63) depict a Lusus Troiae squadron reminiscent of Aen. 5.545–605. Bleisch brings sympathetic insights to the Deiphobus figure and Aeneas' encounter with him in Hades. Jeanne Dion introduces Gallus into her study and suggests that Misenus may be his symbolic twin.

The ecphrasis of the Shield of Aeneas is a perennial topic. Scully's approach is novel: he detects destructive elements of fire and passion transmuted from savagery to victory flames and images. But, the conversion is incomplete, because traces of base metal remain. Fowler and Fucecchi shed complementary light on the Nisus and Euryalus episode in the ninth book. Fowler also treats the significance of the depiction on Pallas' baldric (Aen. 10.495–99 and 12.940–52) under "The Ruin of Time: Monuments and Survival at Rome," in his Roman Constructions (see item 204 below). Jacobson suggests that the proper name Ia-pyx, when aligned with Greek pyxis "medicine box," befits the healer and his drugs. According to Beare, Vergil's common swallow (Juturna's counterpart at Aen. 12.473–78) gathered up flies, small edibles, suitable for nestlings. Casali shows that Idmon, Turnus' messenger to Aeneas on the eve of the duel, is indebted to the prophet who participates in the Argonautic expedition, certain of death. So Vergil suggests that Turnus' recourse to Idmon signals his awareness of the same inevitability. Nicoll perceives that the near disaster for Aeneas, wounded on the field, and its reversal, signals the necessity of Turnus' death and guarantees Aeneas' progress towards apotheosis (12.793–94). Toptsi accents the penitential and retributive quality of Turnus' death, and the poet's concern with the preventive/providential factor. "It is an act of restraint planned ultimately by Jupiter and executed by the hand of Aeneas, although ignorant of the cosmic significance of his act, which aims at securing the stability of the social order Aeneas struggles to establish in Italy” (177).

Binder’s study of the reception of the Dido-tragedy is comprehensive and directional. Burden’s anthology of essays contains a welcome account of Elizabethan Dido (Purkiss) a dazzling gallery attesting to Dido’s presence in the visual arts (Montagu), a fresh interpretation of Mercury’s double visit (Feeney), and a search for metatheatrical elements in Dido’s tragedy (Pobjoy). Drake’s essay points out that the connection with the Punic Wars in book 4 is pervasive and that Vergil’s sympathetic portrayal of Dido is part of a complex reading of Rome’s rise to power and a demonstration that the struggle with Carthage was woven into the same fate by which Romans had been destined to rule the world. Drake argues that book 4 overall is an allegory of the three Punic Wars, and a pessimistic interpretation of recent events; the fall of the Republic and the destruction of Carthage were interconnected.

122. B. Poulle. "Le théâtre de Marcellus et la sphère." MEFR 111 (1999) 257–272.

Bleisch sheds fresh light on a critical turn in the Nisus and Euryalus episode. Borca's review of chthonian environments in Lucretius' DRN, in Vergil's challenging Avernian scene, and in derivative versions elsewhere, particularly in Seneca, focuses on rivers and marshes. Green's piece on Diana Nemorensis, haunt of the Golden Bough, is exceptional for description and interpretation, and distinguished for its clarity. Jenkyns' leisurely, expansive study of Virgil's Experience in 712 pages has obviously captured the limelight; mega biblion..., tantae molis erat... maybe, but the study is peppered with shrewd observations, exemplary criticism, keen observation, sensitivity to sound and light; valuable on many counts, it is generally enlightening. Galinsky's review provides a well-tempered response to Jenkyns' exceptional study. Poulle's article describes and interprets the theater of Marcellus in detail, and argues for its symbolic function.

The debate over optimism vs. pessimism in the Georgics continues unabated: Monica Gale, Llewelyn Morgan, Stephanie Nelson, and Sabine Schafer have certainly kept the controversy alive. Katharina Volk asks whether we should credit Vergil with "formulating a coherent philosophy...about the human condition, or whether we might not seriously consider the possibility that the poem has no simple message — or perhaps no ‘message’ at all.” (167). Luck offers a bracing and fascinating glimpse of beliefs and manners.

Critics have returned to terra firma in their review of Roman monuments and their application to Vergil’s texts. Diane Favro’s study of The Urban Image has excited lynx-eyed scrutiny of Augustan Rome by students and scholars, and has evoked some illuminating reviews of her “trial” venture. Habinek’s Politics and (with Schiesaro) Cultural Revolution break neglected ground and offer provocative views for Vergilians to ponder. Loupiac’s book treads familiar territory with heightened awareness and some cogent arguments.

Ovid and Horace share center stage in the criticism of Vergil's contemporaries, most emphatically Ovid, who claims attention as literary analyst and commentator, and as a sympathetic, perceptive reader of Vergil. The impact of Conte, Barchiesi, Farrell, Thomas, Pucci, and Hinds on intertextuality, relationships and interpretation, has excited meticulous reading of familiar and neglected texts for literary allusions and a growing awareness of the complexity of their associations.

Vergilian metrics have regained critical attention as support for character and context. Farrell's study of Latin Language and Latin Culture offers a different wide-ranging view of Latin as a language and as a vehicle for cultural practice: Vergilians should welcome this important examination of Vergil's medium. Laird's study of speech presentation offers valuable testimony and acute criticism, and can be profitably associated with Lobe's perceptive study. Putnam's study of the nature and role of ekphraseis in the epic offers a summary challenge to past and future understanding of their implications for the epic. Richard Thomas' essays on intertextuality in Vergil offer instructive and cogent “new” directions for Vergilian scholars. Wills continues to excite appreciative critical response to his cogent study of repetition and figures of allusion.

Breed targets echo (resonare) as a phenomenon of the fictional world, and as metaphor for relations between texts. Vergil's Bucolics are traditional, but echo allows him to sidestep literary chronology. "The Bucolics can be read alongside, not strictly after, his modern texts." Gale's exploration of Vergil's indebtedness to resonances and instruction in Lucretius' didactic poem is welcome and authoritative. Giesecke's study of cross-generic imitation of Lucretius' poem treats a formative factor in Vergil's art and complements Gale's work. Warden's study of patria praecepta examines the "dialogue" involving Aen. 6.719–853 and DRN 3.1024–1094 where Vergil disputes with (and overturns) Lucretius on many counts.

Renewed interest in the poets of the Silver Age, and in the Flavian period particularly, has generated important studies. Ariemma's chronicle of research on Silius Italicus offers guidance and inspiration to new departures: Delarue has met the challenge in his study of "originalité et cohérence." Lucan scholarship continues to move aggressively with Vergilian epic as backdrop. John Henderson's Fighting for Rome argues that Lucan's Bellum Civile explodes the stability of the vaunted Golden Age and the telos of Vergil's epic. Statius' Thebaid re-evaluates traditional epic qualities — accenting the blood feud of brothers in a dysfunctional family in order to illuminate dynastic change and an altered state. Kennedy's edition and translation of The Little Iliad, probably the work of P. Baebius Italicus (ca. A.D. 45–95), is a welcome addition. The Latin text draws on both Vergil and Ovid for vocabulary, syntax, and idioms. Kennedy's version manages to retain the Latin hexameter line in the single lines of the English translation. The text recommends itself for students in High School and for College students at intermediate or advanced levels. Pollmann argues that the central theme of "anti-piety" in the Thebaid is in direct negative correspondence with Vergil's epic. Because Statius' leitmotif is the problem of denial of burial to the fallen, his epic is concerned to provide a moral alternative.

Caveant editores. Reeves’ experienced reflections on editorial practice are valid and compelling. Richard Thomas ponders ideological reception and “encounters” at specific moments over the last two millennia, and examines how successive ages have sought to make the epic conform to their upbeat expectations of Vergil.

Döpp's article deals with a cento of Vergilian verses edited in London in 1638 by Alexander Ross, a Scottish priest associated with the Court of Charles I. Ross' Christias influenced Milton's Paradise Lost (1667). Reigner's "Turnus Bohemicus" concerns an anonymous epic of 1620.

TWENTIETH CENTURY

- 229. Richard F. Thomas. "Goebbels' Georgics." CB 76 (2000) 157–168.

Thomas argues that a “nazified” Georgics had a major impact on Goebbels (1897–1945). Max Jungnickel (1890–1945) produced a biography of Goebbels which details the Reichminister’s classical background, in particular his obsession with Vergil’s Georgics. Why? They provided him with a link to the past and the prophecy of a Führer.
