VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 2001–2002

Alexander G. McKay

In Memoriam

George P. Goold

Charles P. Segal

The present survey of Vergilian scholarship is the fortieth in the Vergilius series. Classical World 68:1 (1974), published in association with The Vergilian Society Inc., contains my “Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographic Survey, 1964–1973.” The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, Walter Donlan, ed. New York and London: Garland 1978. Subsequent reviews have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973) to 47 (2001).

The 2001–2002 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and co-operation of two libraries in particular: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University, and The Robarts Library, University of Toronto. Notices, offprints, and facsimiles of articles, chapters, and titles have been generously supplied by authors, editors, and subscribers. Scholars, authors, editors and publishers are cordially invited and encouraged to send material and advice to the editor:

Farrell provides “Forward” (3–10) to introduce the rationale behind the conference on “The Vergilian Century” at the University of Pennsylvania on November 17–18, 2000, and in his article highlights and tries to account for the shift from Vergil’s centrality in critical discussions of Latin poetry to Ovid’s present hegemony.

APPENDIX VERGILIANA

16. Nicholas Horsfall. “The Moretum Decomposed.” C&M 52 (2001) 303–18.

Subsistence farming lies appropriately at the center of the “Salad” but the details are identifiably literary rather than “scientific.” Horsfall reopens issues of consequence in his lively discussion of the poem’s scope, genre, character, and humorous elements.

ECLOGUES: GENERAL

17. Paul Alpers. What is Pastoral? Chicago and London 1996. Rev: Faber, Phoenix 54 (2000) 352–54.
18. Joy Connolly. “Picture Arcadia: The Politics of Representation in Vergil’s Eclogues.” Vergilius 47 (2001) 80–116.

20. Joël Thomas. Bucoliques, Géorgiques, Virgile. Paris 1998. Rev: Brisson, Latomus 556–57.

Connolly studies twentieth-century preoccupation with the pastoral mode in the context of political pressures brought to bear on U.S. literary and art worlds after World War I, and New Critical characterizations of Vergil’s Arcadia as a frameless political (and social) space, a case of belletristic escapism. Vergil’s pastoral essay in Connolly’s view is an example of poetry as engaged political discourse. Kuipers studies Vergil’s Wheel, the rota of progression from pastoral to didactic to epic as it emerges in Plato, Vergil, Chaucer, and Milton.

27. Christine Perkell. "Vergil Reading His Twentieth-Century Readers: A Study of Eclogue 9." Vergilius 47 (2001) 64–88.

The "competitive" aspect of Bucolic songs, Theocritus through Vergil to the Middle Ages remains constant. Baumbach accents two different approaches to the same topic in the Fifth Bucolic, and two concepts of poetry, oral and written, with a discussion of inspiration and imitation, and the reader as judge of their merits. Breed studies song and voice in the Sixth Bucolic as an ecphrastic subject. The centerpiece (31–86) is not a dramatization but a narration by the primary narrator, Tityrus. Paschalis re-awakens interest in the interplay of science and myth in Silenus' song in the same poem. Perkell surveys the late 20th-century critical landscape (with an appended bibliography, 86–88) and finds that Eclogue 9 typifies a dichotomy of interpretive opinion divided between "optimistic" and "pessimistic" parties. The division "seems to be a function of parallel deployment of describable interpretive conventions, corresponding to observed structural features of the text." (85).

GEORGICS: GENERAL

28. Robert Cramer. Vergils Weltsicht. Optimismus und Pessimismus in Vergils Georgica. Berlin and New York 1998. Rev: Thomas, Gnomon 73 (2001) 580–85.
29. Monica R. Gale. Virgil in the Nature of Things. The "Georgics", Lucretius and the Didactic Tradition. Cambridge 2000. Rev: Hill, G&R 48 (2001) 233–34; Johnston, AJP 123 (2002) 301–5.

33. Peter Toohey. Epic Lessons. An Introduction to Ancient Didactic Poetry. London and New York. 1996. Rev: Parroni, Gnomon 74 (2002) 440–42.

Cramer's analysis and provocative discussion continues to challenge the 'Harvard School.' proponents of disillusionment and contrary political sentiments. Monica Gale's work calls for attentive reading and speculation on didactic poetry. Gowers is concerned with kitchen gardens and their produce in Virgil and Columella, a seductive genre which Virgil felt obliged to omit while extolling the aged Tarentine gardener. Thomas shows that English and 'colonial' responses to the Georgics lack uniformity. He scrutinizes twentieth-century translations and adaptations of the poems, and adduces literal and cultural intertexts extending from the distant period of the English civil war to recent Irish poets, Kavanaugh and Heaney, measuring 'resistance' poets against readings of the Georgics as idealized country life.

GEORGICS: INDIVIDUAL

34. Leah J. Kronenberg. "The Poet's Fiction: Virgil's Praise of the Farmer, Philosopher, and Poet at the End of Georgics 2." HSCP 100 (2000) 341–60.
35. Philip Thibodeau. "The Old Man and his Garden (Verg. Georgic 4, 116–148)." MD 47 (2001) 175–95.

Kronenberg assesses the figures of farmer, philosopher, and poet as metaphors for the human rebellion against laws of nature. Nature would safeguard the genus immortale rather than the individual. The rebellion that strives for order contributes to violence and deception in the process. Thibodeau explores the topos of the elderly man in Georgics 4 tending his garden...a solace for present-day retirees?

Armstrong studies the symbolic function of Crete in its repeated instances as a reminder of the temptations and inevitability of regression, repetition, and diversion from the linear course of history. Crete is portrayed as a cradle of deceit and monstrous passions, and of plague; but it is also a source of cures. Dreams, as extensions of poetic vision, images of prophecy and human psychology, and insanity are much in vogue for several scholars (Bouquet, Hershkowitz, Lake, Scafoglio, and Walde) and their studies enrich our understanding and appreciation of the poet's genius. Julia Dyson's study of Diana Nemorensis accents her importance as agent and cultic backdrop to sacrificial aspects of the epic. Lowrie's contribution to the University of Pennsylvania Conference (#5) argues for 'seriously playful' readings of Vergil's works as antidote to political and aesthetic concentration on the stark contrasts between good and evil. Markus studies Vergilian 'performance' in the context of his age (pp. 168–71). Battle narratives and casualty lists preoccupy Mazzochini. His chief concern is with poetic composition and narrative skill; his line by line commentaries on each selection is highly instructive. Most's contribution to "The Vergilian Century" (#5) examines Vergil's complete repertoire to develop new insights into memory's role in its poetic, erotic, didactic, and political dimensions. The relationship of remembering and forgetting emerges as central to major issues in Vergilian criticism. Aeneas' final act is not rooted exclusively in anger but is a gesture fuelled by memory and forgetfulness. Newman's brief essay explores neglected aspects of the Etruscan content of the epic and Vergil's possible Etruscan lineage, a favorable factor in his relationship with Etruscan Maecenas.

Oliensis examines the unexplored relationship between Vergil's epic and its place as Freudian dream work. Bloom, Hardie, and Reckford pass in review with other neglected experimental readings of the 60s and 70s, and recent gender-oriented readings. Performance and gesture are treated from opposite poles by Campbell and Ricottilli. Shiffman's Platonic reading of the epic is fresh and illuminating.

Khan's meticulous "appreciation" of Amor at the banquet of Aeneid 1 embodies sophisticated responses to Vergil's presentation of the process through which Dido succumbs to love through the agency of Amor. Five passages of crucial importance are involved: 1.657–60; 673–75; 683–88; 707–14; and 717–22. The analysis and discussion throughout is sensible and sensitive. Tragedy (particularly Aeschylean) and epic are brought into a single focus by several scholars (Krummen, Laigneau, and Scafoglio). Research into the tragic factor in Vergil's epic has become something of a preoccupation of British and North American scholarship and important studies on a major scale are in gestation. Book 5, a perennial favorite of students who are devotees of boating and boxing and contests of a wider variety, gains fresh attention for its larger political implications and its paradigms. Khan, in his study of Aeneid 2.780–84, and 3.1–8, stresses Creusa's valedictory as prophecy incorporating the fatality and kingdom motifs exploited later in Apollo's oracle, in Anchises' visionary offering, and elsewhere. After arguing that Vergil modelled Charon's challenge to Aeneas in Aeneid 6.388–97 on Aeacus' challenge to Heracles in an extant fragment of Pirithous, composed by Euripides or Critias [CQ 50 (2000) 192–96], Clark now addresses Vergil's re-arrangement and expansion of the Underworld prior to the crossing of the Styx. Aeneas passes through more traditional experiences and horror earlier in his Catabasis than any of his prototypes, Heracles, Dionysus, or Orpheus. Jacobson reads Aeneid 6.45–48 as a question complementing the interrogation in lines 42ff. Staley's article accents highlights Daedalus' narrative art as explanatory: Exile in Flight; Two Doors, Two Worlds; Cruel Love; Inextricabilis Error; Lost Navigators; Fleeing Images; and Fathers and Sons.

92. Andrea Cucchiarelli. "Vergil on Killing Parthenius (Aen. 10.748)." CJ 97 (2001) 51–54.

Horsfall's somewhat daunting but immensely rich commentary on the Seventh Aeneid continues to excite admiration, respectful queries, and alternative readings. Miller's examination of the Palatine Temple of Apollo as the unexpected goal for Octavian's victory parade in 23 B.C.E., duly reflected in the central circle of Aeneas' shield, was also favored by Nero in December A.D. 67. Quint's impressive article argues that the memory of Sarpedon, introduced first at Aeneid 1.94–101, with Hector, "dictated the logic of Virgil's imitations of Homer in Book 10." Quint's article submits Book 10 to a searching and skilful analysis and discussion. His concerns are with (1) Nymphs, Ships, and Pines; (2) The Brothers of Sarpedon; (3) The Sequence of Battle in Aeneid 10, concentrating on the principal actors — Pallas, Aeneas, Turnus, Mezentius and Orodes, Mezentius, Lausus, and Aeneas, and their debt to Homeric paradigms; and (4) A Question of Survival. Finally, "Like Pallas, all the Sarpedon-like victims of the Aeneid are dying — in the historical long run — for the sake of Iulus and a specifically Augustan future" (p. 66). Tolle, lege. Cucchiarelli's important article highlights the connection between killing and sexual violation. The association of 'maidenly' Parthenius with Rapo (10.747–48) is highly suggestive.

Sarpedon draws the limelight in Aeneid 10 but the cast is also impressive elsewhere. Bateman properly detects Cleopatra and Antony as models for the Punic romance. Christoph parades the Horatii with Aeneas as heroic examples. Cucchiarelli finds that Ovid's depiction of Orpheus is a mixture of Vergil's Orpheus and of Gallus (Eclogue 10). Their destinies were closely comparable. Henderson's breezy article speculates on the particular case which the Aeneid holds up for our collusion in handling the downside of the creation of a social memory for Roman Italy. Ovid, Vergil, and Livy, and Ardea, mythical and actual, are brought into unexpected and mutually informative focus; Servius supplies a surprising amen after a recital of suppression and horror at holy Ardea: totius autem Italiae curiosissimum fuisse Vergilium multifariam apparet. Henderson's parting shot is unsettling and memorable: "The Aeneid winds up — Ovid saw it could run this way — trying harder than ever to make us remember all the forgetting" (p. 23). Read this and wonder. Hughes studies connecting theme and variations involving Creusa and Andromache. Keith's admirably compact volume gains strength in the parade of perceptive reviewers. Panoussi provides a remarkably sensitive perception of Vergil's Ajax from the standpoint of allusion, tragic and heroic identity. Her study joins forces with other scholars who have been recently sensitive to the tragic force of the epic. Perotti's examination of the virtues and faults of Euryalus and Nisus, particularly in the night exploit, is concise and persuasive. Rivoltella's essay focuses on the plaintive pursuit of the deceased (Creusa's retention and elevation is equated with death) by the abandoned (or deceived) male party. Spence's review of the appearances of Athena/Minerva inside and outside the epic action, even by suggestion in the final compact on Olympus, is welcome and provocative.

Delcourt's review of the role of Evander in the Pallanteum-Rome legend deals effectively with several interpretations of the legend, especially with Vergil, Aeneid 8.844–49. Evander earns respect as a wise king and civilizer, as a veritable humanist before literature itself. His Italian Arcady abides because it embodies the ideal life of humility and proximity to nature. Lest we forget, Dingel's article highlights Vergil's elevation of the eponym of the Gens Iulia to the stature of king by identifying Iulus with Ascanius, but does not make him forefather of the Kings at Alba Longa. Jupiter confirms and endorses the derivation of Iulus from Ilus (Aeneid 1.267 ff.) and so underscores Trojan ancestry.

De Callatay's study provides an imaginative contaminatio of the genius of Vergil and of Vitruvius, architect of the original Agrippan Pantheon (27 B.C.E.) which the author supposes (incorrectly) recalled the domical Bath of "Mercury" at Baiae and elsewhere in the Campi Phlegraei. In a study laced with Pythagorean associations, De Callatay revels in the polysemy of the Vitruvian text, and constructs an untenable friendship involving Vergil and the architect, fortunati ambo, where Nisus equates with Vitruvius and Euryalus with Vergil lodged together in the circle of Maecenas. Ogden's article includes Avernus in Campania is his brief catalogue of Nekyomanteia, but unfortunately discards necromancy in Italian caves (which abound in the Campi Phlegraei) for simpler lakeside precincts and incubation. Temple's study revives Robert Paget's observations and arguments in favor of an Antrum associated with the Mysteries (Orphic, Eleusinian?). He provides an exciting account of personal descents (and returns) with memorable photographs as evidence of renewed exploration and strives to rouse new awareness of the nature and complexity of the Baian tunnel. Rehak's careful study of the Ara Pacis relief of the sacrifice of the brood sow (endorsed by Vergil, Varro, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus) favors the second king, Numa Pompilius, over Aeneas, as the "ideal of the peaceful ruler" appropriately matched against Romulus, the warlike king, on the balancing entrance panel.

Putnam's contribution to the University of Pennsylvania Conference (#5) detects a distillation of Vergilian themes, ideas, and motifs in Ovid's Myrrha episode, and employs intertextual relationships to explicate the transformation of Vergilian into Ovidian poetry. Ovid's intertextual exploration of Vergilian ideas and motifs sheds light on Aeneas who undergoes 'metamorphosis' into Pallas; he argues that a series of Vergilian transformations through exile and death anticipate the Metamorphoses, Tristia, and Epistulae ex Ponto.
