Vergilian Bibliography 2003-2004

ALEXANDER G. MCKAY

The present survey of Vergilian scholarship is the forty-second in the Vergilius series. Classical World 68.1 (1974) published in association with The Vergilian Society Inc., contains my "Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographic Survey, 1964-73." The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, Walter Donlan, ed. New York and London: Garland 1978. Subsequent reviews have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973) to 49 (2003).

The 2003-2004 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and cooperation of several libraries: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University, and The Robarts Library, University of Toronto. Notices, offprints, and facsimiles of articles, chapters and titles have been generously supplied by authors, editors, publishers, and subscribers. Readers are cordially invited and encouraged to send material and advice to the editor:

Reay's article reconstructs an ancient context of reception in an effort to coordinate the poem's form and technical content for a Roman readership, particularly for Roman estate owners.

Barnes searches the Georgics for clues to what happened at Tarentum after conquest, the attraction of its wealth for settlers, early and late, for colonists and for Rome's elite, including Augustan poets. Vergil (Georgics 2. 149-150) signals that Italy's "spring is perpetual, and summer extends to months other than her own; twice a year the cows calve, twice a year the trees serve us fruit." Scholars today are dubious about the reliability of Vergil's claims for Italian productivity. Fox recalls that Jerome considered Vergil a worthy authority on the pregnancy of sheep and goats twice annually and lent the master poet's weight to his explication of a passage in Genesis where Jacob and Laban were involved in a dispute about the division of herds.

Adler traces Vergil's treatment of Epicureanism in Vergil's epic, and notices that "as the center of the de Rerum Natura had been Lucretius' denial of Acheron, the center of the Aeneid is Vergil's assertion of Acheron. The Aeneid is Vergil's battle against Lucretius on behalf of men's belief in divine anger and punishment" (225-226). Ando dwells on Vergil's concept of Italia and its overall conceptual history. Monica Gale explores the implications of parallels between three Vergilian episodes involving the hero's backward glance too soon and too late. Parallels and contrasts between the episodes highlight Vergil's exploration of dichotomies between poetry and politics, individual and community, past and future. Brant Hannah highlights power relationship in the Roman world; wars from Troy to Actium are based on enmity between two genealogical lines, those of Dardanus and Inachus. Scully compares Homer's larger, more romantic view of love and marriage with Vergil's distrust of amor and its irrational effect on men and their wars.

Kraggerud III deals with the intertextuality of the opening verses in relation to Ennius and analyzes the grammatical and lexicographical implications of quo numine laeso in its context and in relation to the Iliad. Jacobson argues against the usual interpretation "we are not in such utter darkness." In his reading the Carthaginians are not unenlightened: they are a just and upright people, and the sun does shine in Carthage. Feldherr highlights achronicity, temporal perspectives of internal and external audiences; the boxing match of Dares and Entellus figures significantly in the wider context of the epic. Hughes argues that Vergil accents the women's rebellion in Aeneid 5 through allusions that associate them with Euripides' Troades.

the End of the Aeneid." CJ 99 (2003-4) 135-156.

Gross focuses on Pallas' funeral rites and Pallas as immolation, and offers an explanation of Aeneas' controversial statement at the close. "By killing Turnus, Aeneas in a very real sense annihilates himself (and his past). Turnus is Aeneas' alter ego." Bleisch accents the crucial significance of the Regia passage for the epic. Marinčič relates the Arcadia theme of Eclogue 4 to the historical myth of Hercules and Cacus. Galinsky interprets the end of the Aeneid as Vergil's reworking of Roman historical epic in response to themes of Greek tragic drama.

Jamart's article offers a probing parallel study of Vergil's Camilla and Statius' Parthenopaeus. McGill provides instances of authors who sought to rework and reinterpret Aeneid themes. Some approached the epic as poetry capable of being made anew, recasting language and content with varying degrees of fidelity to the original. Pagán argues that both anachronistic ecphrases enabled the poet and historian to deal with "moments of extreme cultural and political crisis" (58). Pattimo's study of satiric degradation highlights Petronius' pilot and Vergil's Palinurus. The Watson volume of Martial's epigrams attaches particular interest to Epigram 8.55 (number 15, in their collection). Panoussi targets sinister contrasts between Lucan 3 and Aeneid 6 (a case of deforestation to fuel the funeral pyre of Misenus) and the sea battle at Actium in Aeneid 8.

Baschera compares Servius, Scholia Veronesis and modern commentaries in his quest for the meaning of infelix (noxious, or unlucky?) in the syntagm of infelicitis Ulixi in the Achaemenides episode. McDonough, Prior and Stansbury provide a serviceable annotated translation of Servius' Commentary on Aeneid 4. Murgia accepts the supposition that Servius' commentary was written by AD 410.

Ortiz's article treats the terrifying figure of Oroonoko, a fictional West African prince sold into slavery who featured in Aphra Behn's novella in 1688. Behn's story was reworked in 1695 in Thomas Southerne's tragedy, and most recently in Biyi Bandele's 1999 version. Behn's novella has been remodelled into drama, poetry, and even abolitionist propaganda. Ortiz realizes that Oroonoko: Or the Royal Slave, is a masterpiece of prose fiction with Vergilian traits.
