Vergilian Bibliography 2004-2005

ALEXANDER G. MCKAY

This survey of Vergilian scholarship is the forty-third in the Vergilius series. Classical World 68.1 (1974), published in association with The Vergilian Society Inc., contains my "Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographic Survey, 1964-73." The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, Walter Donlan, ed., New York and London: Garland 1978. Subsequent reviews have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973)–50 (2004).

The 2004-2005 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and cooperation of two libraries: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University, and The Robarts Library, University of Toronto. Notices, offprints, and facsimiles of articles, chapters, and titles have been generously supplied by authors, editors, publishers, and subscribers. Readers are cordially invited and encouraged to send material and advice to the editor:

Holzberg studies the Catalepton collection as a post-Vergilian offering of a Maro personatus, recalling Catullan Priapea. The three Priapea prefacing the Catalepton collection are associated with Georgics I and Eclogues and so signal the need for new study of the collection. Jacobson locates the Culex ca. 20-40 A.D. Baldwin tackles Laudari's Moretum with characteristic wit and illuminating insights. Olszaniec emends Copa 35 to: formosum os tenerae decerpens ore puellae.

Erren’s text, translation, and commentary on the Georgics provide bountiful new food for thought, not least the assessment of the Aristaeus epyllion as a script for pantomime. Hardie’s observations on political education are directional and persuasive. Nappa’s post-Actium study highlights important historical aspects.

56. R. Thibodeau, "The watery something of Virgil, Georgics 4. 234." CQ 54 (2004) 636-640.

Murgatroyd tracks panorama and cinematic close-up in his examination of Georgics 4. 317-558. Vergil is master of spatial sweep and tight focus, of converging and returning movement, and of fast and slow space for different objectives: he is a master in the involvement of space in the building of atmosphere, and of spatial and internal parallelism and antithesis to enrich inner and outer narratives.

Barchiesi appeals for interdisciplinary discussion to accent literal indications such as location and architecture, recourse to deictics and numerology as pointers to the economy of patronage, and the agenda of Augustan ideology. Targets include Aeneid 7.153-173 (pp. 139-143) and the Andromache episode (pp. 146-149). Behr argues that the narrator's direct statements and silences in apostrophes put his teleological approach in perspective. Courtney argues that common conjunctive errors indicate that the capital mss. of Vergil descend from an archetype (Timpanaro and others argue for horizontal transmission). Problematic passages include Eclogues 6.61-73, Georgics 4.520-521, and Aeneid 9.914 and 10.366. Lowell Edmunds highlights historicism and formalism, reception, and philology. Allan Evans detects a persistent sub-theme in the epic: the assimilation of the "other" to Rome's imperial destiny -- the "self" of Rome. Dido, the quintessential "other", is destroyed by her love for Aeneas; Pallas, the Greek "other", and Turnus, the Italian "other", die for help and resistance. Aeneas, the Asian "other", abandons his plans for a new Troy and assimilates to Rome's destiny. La Penna effectively balances Evander's dwelling, Dido's palace, and the Arcadian Palatine. Lowrie examines the pragmatics of literature and the enigma of performance.

Guittard studies the Sibylline Books and the Libri Vegoici for possible links between the Etruscan nymph Vecu, Vegoia, or Begoe (Serv. ad Aen. 6.72) and Sibylline prophecy. Murgia studies the problem of the authenticity of Aeneid 2.567-588, generally assessed as Julio-Claudian. Awkwardness in the episode may arise from conflation or misapplication of borrowed material. Lucan may be a source, with the poet of the Helen episode as imitator. The funeral games of Anchises are thematically integral to the epic according to Dunkle. They serve to signal the transition of the Trojans from losers to winners in the arena of history. Bruss detects the presence of an epigram in the last two lines of Aeneid 5.870-871, a device to accent the narrative importance of Palinurus' death. Cormier confronts the enigma of who carries the Golden Bough before Charon. R. J. Clark (1979) argued that the Sibyl should hold the Bough and show it to Charon; Heyne, Norden and Otis favored Aeneas. The medieval tradition of commentaries, glosses, scholia and annotations remain important factors in determining certainty on the question.

Smolenaars senses the evolution of Venus from love-goddess to Venus Genetrix, and the dynastic mythology of Augustus, in the encounter of Venus and Vulcan in Aeneid 8.370ff. The light-hearted scene activates the double identity of Venus, love-goddess and mother. The humor is irreverent and Alexandrian. Noonan argues that the ending of the epic is "part of the discourse of late Republican politics" (p. 43), and that contemporary civic standards are implied in the climactic battles in Latium (p. 34).

Clark shows that Vergil's poetry pervades Horace, Odes 1.3 verbally and thematically in a manner designed to flatter Vergil. Vergil pioneers a new breakthrough--even as Horace emulates him on poetical and political levels. Horace reworks Vergil's treatment of the aftermath of Prometheus and his allusion to the civil wars in Eclogue 4. Deremetz studies the Sibyl in Vergil, Ovid, and Silius Italicus. Foulon engages with the Vergilian Sibyl in Propertius and Tibullus. Farrell argues that the ille ego 'false preface' to the epic was echoed by Ovid in his own career statement, which moves from an earlier ludic phase to rueful retrospective from exile. Galinsky detects verbal affinities between Horace's Cleopatra and Vergil's Dido and argues for creative interchange. Horace's Cleopatra in Odes 1.37 is one of many models for tragic Dido. Gosling discovers intratextual echoes between Vergil and Ovid. Ovid uses verbal allusion, rhetorical colouring and metrical emphasis to highlight his characterisation of Mezentius, redirecting the story to highlight Mezentius' brutality. Paul Miller engages with Dido's letter to Aeneas in Ovid's Heroides suggesting that Dido's voice opens up a dialogue with the monologic tendency of the epic which destabilises its version of events. John Miller suggests that Vergil's presentation of Actian Apollo reverberates in Propertius 2.4 which reveals knowledge of Aeneid 8 and Aeneid 1. Propertius 4.6 in Miller's assessment stresses Callimachean connections of Apollo's Delian origin, and provides a different poetic slant on Apollo's manifestation.

Harrison notices that the word imago (= simile) in Vergil, Ovid and the Flavian poets is occasionally unearthed within, or in the immediate context of , an epic simile. The device is an aid to metaphorical effects: for intertextual cross-referencing to similes in previous epics, for intratextual purposes to link the relevant simile with previous material in the same epic, and for poetically ambiguous means to exploit the wide semantic range involved in the usage of imago.

Dominik studies Statius' epilogue to the Thebaid 12.810-19 in a different light. Critics have generally read the lines as confession of poetic inferiority to Vergil; Dominik argues that the verses are meant to encourage readers to respect the intellectual merits of the epic and its role within a larger tradition. Feeney treats Statius' undernourished Achilleid from the standpoint of the sexual ambiguity of Achilles, the legacy from Ovidian and Vergilian epic, and the poet's concern to establish a distinctive creative difference between Thebaid and Achilleid. Quintus of Smyrna's 4th century capo lavoro soars in a scholarly revival. McGill provides the first systematic study of mythological and secular centos. Morzadec explores what inspired Statius to plant imperial panegyric in the Sibyl's descriptive, visionary speech (IV. 3.123-163).

Cusset effectively traces connections between Cassandra and Vergil's Deiphobe. Nelis finds impressive parallels between Jason's Medea and Vergil's Sibyl. Both are priestesses of Hecate (Deiphobe serves Apollo too), both are linked with catabatic traditions, and both have Homeric paradigms, Circe and Calypso.

Belayche surveys the transformation from pagan seer to quasi-Christian prophet. Acher-Ferlampin tracks the Vergilian Sibyl in varied modes, as prophetess and mother figure from antiquity to the 14th century. Hardie highlights parades of national worthies which are designed to motivate the hero and engage the nationalistic reader. He underscores links between Aeneid 6 and Spenser's Book 3, Canto 3; Michael's revelation of descendants to Adam in Milton's Paradise Lost 11 where Cain is identified as the new Marcellus, and Silius Italicus' vision of Scipio and its parallel in Petrarch's Africa. Hinds assesses Cicero and Vergil as models and parallels for Petrarch's prose epistles and epic verse. Hüe detects Sibyls in 12th century versions of Rouen Christmas processions of prophets, with Isaiah and Daniel. Her forecast of the Last Judgment affected several 15th century plays. Mora shows that by the 13th century the Sibyl had lost her prophetic voice and virgin nature. Perkell compares the Vergilian and Dantean underworlds. The irony of Dante's treatment of doomed souls such as Francesca suggests an ironic reading of some of Vergil's victims, such as Palinurus. Dante's irony sets the truth against characters; their sometime-delusions of virtue and Vergil's pagan irony stresses an absence of insight apparent in the gap that separates Palinurus' account of his death from the narrator's version in Book 5. Ziolkowski addresses musical notation (neumes) in 12th century Vergilian manuscripts which serves to direct and suggests recitation style. Direct speech was once prominently marked, but the signs have disappeared by the end of the 12th century; Latin poetry and musical chant have taken separate paths.

Joy Connolly deals with current work on the republican tradition in literature and political thought. She focuses on translations of Vergil by the 17th century theorist James Harrington in a study of reception (114-126) of Vergil's pastorals and epic. David Quint assesses Milton's dark reworking of what appears to be positive political material and reveals the negativity of the Vergilian original: the statesman simile in Book I "hints at the violence built into the settlement that Augustus imposed on the Roman political world" (p.180), and the City of Pandemonium exposes the dark, hellish side of Vergil's Carthage and Rome. The fallen Satan and Adam resemble Aeneas after his shipwreck, starting afresh from the bottom.

Johnson reviews Lowell's "Falling Asleep over the Aeneid." to discover and assess Lowell's ambivalence towards the epic and military imperialism in general. His vehicle is the 'exquisite ambiguity' of the funeral of Pallas. The fascistic color, sexual imagery, and ties with Lowell's own family losses in the Civil War are duly explored. The high-tide of New Criticism and foreshadowings of "Harvard-School" Vergilian scholarship are intriguingly displayed by Ralph Johnson. Lowrie's essay provides an exercise in Vergilian reception through Maurice Blanchot's thoughts on Hermann Broch's The Death of Virgil which he embodies in a short story, "The Moment of My Death." (Blanchot's reversal lays emphasis neither on self-sacrifice nor on sparing the epic at Vergil's death; the man survives and the written work is lost.)

Colette traces Advent and Christmas sequences, and tropes and chanted breviary prayers, as testimony to the Sibyl as prophetess. The reliance of the works on a single monody suggests that they were very ancient. Fitzgerald (199-210) offers an analysis of Berlioz's Les Troyens and highlights female dominance in the action. There is a large scale expansion of Cassandra's role in Part I as counterpart to Dido's premier role at Carthage. The composer chose to stress betrayal and destruction rather than triumph: the opera literally transforms the epic. Isabelle His traces the Sibyl in music that highlights Christ's birth, the Passion and the Resurrection. Twelve 16th century versions exhibit individual, iconographic models of the Sibyl. Maurice Ohana's three 20th century compositions include the Sibyl. Isabelle His studies the libretto, and accents reversals of the Aeneid in plot, performance, characterization, and political implications.
