

VERGILIUS

VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY, 1964-5

Author(s): Alexander G. McKay

Source: Vergilius (1959-), 1965, No. 11 (1965), pp. 40-47

Published by: The Vergilian Society

Stable URL: <https://www.jstor.org/stable/41592258>

JSTOR is a not-for-profit service that helps scholars, researchers, and students discover, use, and build upon a wide range of content in a trusted digital archive. We use information technology and tools to increase productivity and facilitate new forms of scholarship. For more information about JSTOR, please contact support@jstor.org.

Your use of the JSTOR archive indicates your acceptance of the Terms & Conditions of Use, available at <https://about.jstor.org/terms>

The Vergilian Society is collaborating with JSTOR to digitize, preserve and extend access to Vergilius (1959-)

JSTOR

VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY, 1964-5

ECLOGUES AND GEORGICS

1. Viktor Poeschl, Die Hirtendichtung Virgils. Heidelberg: Carl Winter Universitätsverlag, 1964.
2. John J. H. Savage, 'The Art of the Seventh Eclogue of Vergil,' TAPA 94 (1963) 248-67.
3. Marcel Orban, 'Virgile, Buc., IV, 28: Un prodige en devenir,' LEC 33 (1965) 127-39.
4. D. A. Kidd, 'Imitation in the Tenth Eclogue,' BICS 11 (1964) 54-64.
5. W. Leonard Grant, Neo-Latin Literature and the Pastoral. Chapel Hill, N. C.; University of North Carolina Press, 1965.
6. Friedrich Klingner, Virgils Georgica ('Die Bibliothek der Alten Welt; Reihe Forschung und Deutung') Zurich and Stuttgart: Artemis Verlag, 1963.
7. George Doig, 'Vergil, Georgics I 491-2,' AJP 86 (1965) 85-8.
8. W. Liebeschuetz, 'Beast and Man in the Third Book of Virgil's Georgics,' G&R 12 (1965) 64-77.
9. Elmar Hartmann, 'Die Gallus-Inschrift auf dem Vatikanischen Obelisk,' Gymnasium 72 (1965) 1-9 (including plate).

Poeschl (1) offers a clear analysis of Eclogues 1 and 7 and regards both as providing insight into the make-up of the Latin classic. For Poeschl specific Roman qualities include symmetry and contrast, monumentality and simplicity, clarity and graphic exposition, idealization and realism, a tension in relaxation, Humanitas, and a lyric and religious element. The ingredients are variously emphasized in the two Eclogues under discussion, and although Poeschl speaks now with almost sacerdotal authority, one imagines him, and several of his fellow critics as well, as desperately trying to find the egg in the omelet. His view of Eclogue 7 as a bucolic Ars Poetica where Vergil expresses his views on poetry and the poet's task by example rather than precept, is intriguing. Thyrsis, the inferior competitor in style, metre, content and tone, may be Vergil's parody of a bucolic style he discounted, and Corydon, the proper embodiment of a style, molle atque facetum, a conscious artist, may provide Vergil's own manifesto behind the mask. Savage (2), like Poeschl, is alert to symmetry in the Eclogues, and is aware of balancing and contrasting motifs and patterns between Eclogues 3 and 7 which he regards as complementary poems, dating probably to 39-38 B.C. Though one may demur at his naming the poem 'A Ballade of Trees and the Poet' written perhaps to celebrate the recent wedding of Livia Drusilla with Octavian, nevertheless some of his identifications, within the Masque, are challenging: Corydon = Domitius Marsus, Vergil's contemporary and friend; Thyrsis = Horace; Daphnis = Octavianus Caesar, and Phyllis = Livia Drusilla. Only Meliboeus eludes identification. Orban's article (3) explicates molli paulatim flavescet campus arista, assumes hypallage, and applies molli to campus with the implication that the softening of the earth is another symptom of the Golden Age. Kidd (4) examines the pattern of imitation in the four parts of Eclogue 10 (1-8; 9-30; 31-69; 70-77) and shows that the poem is a subtle richly wrought composition rather than a confusing assortment of unrelated themes.

Leonard Grant (5) traces the line of Vergilian influence into the Renaissance and Baroque periods, into the bucolics of Petrarch and Boccaccio. He shows how the form was distorted to express the poet's opinions on almost every situation, from the plight of the peasants and monasteries, to heartier songs of hunters and sailors.

Klingner's commentary on the Georgics (6) is an immensely useful study of Vergil's achievement, his indebtedness to older literary forms, poetic and technical, and also of the philosophical content which is characteristically Vergil's own. Like Poeschl (1) Klingner is equally alert to the components of Classical, particularly Augustan, Literature: symmetry and contrast, multiple levels of meaning, of reference and relationship, together with the art of foreshadowing and subtle progression. Altogether a praiseworthy volume, never abstruse or over-emphatic, a model of T. H. Huxley's exhortation, to approach literature as 'refined pleasure.' Doig (7) examines Vergil's troublesome use of Emathia and the plains of Haemus in a context of Civil War and argues that etymological factors with intimations of bloodshed, and either the gladiatorial arena or plain of combat, dictated that choice of words.

Liebeschuetz (8) suggests that Georgics 3 may be read at several levels: (a) as textbook on the raising of animals; (b) as description of the stages of life through which animals and men pass from life to death; (c) as an evocation of the forces which shape and determine men's lives and the lives of the higher animals (cattle and horses), internal passions (sex, aggressiveness, sense of honour, ambition), and external factors (climate, pests, and disease). Liebeschuetz notices that the gods are absent as determining factors in the lives of Beast and Man, which may be a clue to Lucretian influence, not merely stylistic, but in subject matter as well. Hartmann (9) contributes some useful notices on the recently discovered Gallus inscription on the Obelisk in St. Peter's Square. The inscription was discovered beneath the Caligula inscription which dates from the time of its recovery from Heliopolis, and prior to its location in the Circus of Gaius and Nero. The reconstructed inscription records action in Egypt on the part of Cornelius Gallus, Rome's first elegist and arrogant Prefect of Egypt. Gallus was finally recalled by Augustus and committed suicide. Vergil's regret for his friend's disgrace and demise has been detected in the Eclogues, and, by some, in the revised version of Georgic 4. The inscription reads:

IUSSU IMP CAESARIS DIVI F
C CORNELIUS CN F GALLUS
PRAEF FABR CAESARIS DIVI F
FORUM IULIUM FECIT.

THE AENEID

10. Franz Joseph Worstbrock, Elemente einer Poetik der Aeneis. Untersuchungen zum Gattungsstil Vergilianischer Epik. (Orbis Antiquus, 21) Muenster, Westfalen: Aschendorffsche Verlagsbuchhandlung, 1963.
11. Michael C. J. Putnam, The Poetry of the Aeneid. Four Studies in Imaginative Unity and Design. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1965.
12. Georg Nikolaus Knauer, Die Aeneis und Homer. Studien zur poetischen Technik Vergils mit Listen der Homerzitate in der Aeneis. ('Hypomnemata' No. 7). Goettingen: Vandenhoeck & Rupprecht, 1964.
13. id., 'Vergil's Aeneid and Homer,' GRBS 5 (1964) 61-84.
14. Wendell Clausen, 'Callimachus and Roman Poetry,' GRBS 5 (1964) 181-96.
15. W. S. Maguinness, 'L'Inspiration tragique de l'Enéide,' AC 32 (1963) 477-90.
16. D. Knecht, 'Virgile et ses modèles latins,' AC 32 (1963) 491-512.
17. H. D. Jocelyn, 'Ancient Scholarship and Virgil's Use of Republican Latin Literature,' I, CQ 14 (1964) 295ff; II, CQ 15 (1965) 126-44.
18. Kenneth Quinn, 'Some Dying Words: Tragic Insight in the Aeneid and the Question of Virgil's Competence,' AUMLA 22 (1964) 178-90.
19. H. L. Tracy, 'Fata Deum and the Action of the Aeneid,' G&R 11 (1964) 188-95.
20. L. A. MacKay, 'Hero and Theme in the Aeneid,' TAPA 94 (1963) 157-66.
21. W. R. Johnson, 'Aeneas and the Ironies of Pietas,' CJ 60 (1965) 360-4.
22. Smith Palmer Bovie, 'Manus: Virgil's Portraiture of Human Hands,' The Minnesota Review 4 (1964) 513-20.
23. Thomas Halter, 'Vergils Aeneis-Proömium,' WS 77 (1964) 76-110.
24. Kenneth Quinn, 'The Fourth Book of the Aeneid: a Critical Description,' G&R 12 (1965) 16-26.
25. Alfred Schmitz, Infelix Dido. Etude esthétique et psychologique du livre IV de l'Enéide de Virgile. Philadelphia, Pa.: Chilton Books (distributor). c. 1963.
26. Roger A. Hornsby, 'The Vergilian Simile as Means of Judgment,' CJ 60 (1965) 337-44.
27. Madeline C. Covi, 'Dido in Vergil's Aeneid,' CJ 60 (1964) 57-60.
28. Edward Phinney, Jr., 'Dido and Sychaeus,' CJ 60 (1965) 360-4.
29. F. N. Lees, 'Dido, Queen of Carthage' and 'The Tempest,' Notes and Queries 11 (1964) 147-9.
30. Elliv Skard, 'Die Heldenschau in Vergils Aeneis,' SO 40 (1965) 53-65.
31. Egil Kraggerud, 'Caeneus und der Heroinnenkatalog, Aeneis VI 440ff,' SO 40 (1965) 66-71.
32. Henning Mörlund, 'Zu Aeneis VI 601ff,' SO 39 (1964) 5-12.
33. Carl Becker, 'Der Schilde des Aeneas,' WS 77 (1964) 11-127.

Worstbrock (10) treats the poetic technique of the Aeneid under three headings: (a) organization of material, (b) verse and syntax, and (c) use of epithets. His lists and statistical compilations are most valuable. The epithets which he has concentrated upon relate to color, size, and individual persons. His study of Vergil's methods of composition leads him to argue for a three-fold division, already familiar to many of his readers. But W. A. Camps in his review (CR 15 (1965) 185-6) has a challenging alternative. Michael Putnam's studies (11) are alert to artifice and poetic 'reverberations' to a rare degree in the four books of his choice: Aeneid 2, 4, 8, and 12. Putnam is less inclined to concentrate on calculated symmetries, numerical or tonal, than on unifying imaginative patterns, salient images which once isolated, give symbolic unity to the poem. Putnam dredges deep for his submerged metaphors, and as tastemaker his work will have undoubted influence and will bring many to fresh insight into the creative processes of a poet's mind. Knauer's major study of Homeric elements in Vergil (12) appeared in epitome, and in English, elsewhere (13). The table of citations and structural imitations are extremely valuable: Vergil's masterful 'restudy' of the Homeric epics is demonstrably marvelous. But equally important, Knauer reminds his readers that Aeneas attains a plane far above that of the Greek heroes, and his divine mission to found a New Troy which is Rome provides this moral uplift in his heroic character. Clausen (14) emphasizes the Callimachean character of Vergil's pastoral poetry and goes so far as to argue that Eclogue 6 is an uncompromising though somewhat oblique statement on the Callimachean aesthetic. The character of the Georgics Book, with the epyllion and aition at the close (G. 4) and the reflection on Gallus (which Clausen accepts as part of the original unedited version) seem to have Callimachean traits and emphasis. Influence has also featured in several other articles: Maguinness' careful observations (15) deal less with actual instances of Vergil's indebtedness to Euripides and others than with the Vergilian tragic view of life, and the tragic design of the careers of Dido and Turnus, among others. Knecht (16) provides an account of formal correspondences between Vergil and Ennius, Lucretius, Catullus and others, and tabulates the evidence of the borrowings which he has detected. Jocelyn's articles (17) expand the matter of indebtedness in a valuable and most enlightening fashion. Kenneth Quinn (18) whose studies always command respect for their freshness of vision and articulate style, emphasizes Vergil's exploitation of the devices of tragic irony and insight in the Aeneid. Quinn concentrates on a modest number of passages, all characterised by deliberate imprecision of language. Comprehension of something which proceeds beyond plain statement requires a most responsive mind for their proper interpretation. Robert Graves, whose strictures against Vergil's antipoetic nature are notorious, regards such indirectness as a poetic blunder, as cleverly self-conscious. Quinn pleads for an investigation of Vergil's technique of transcending plain statement or explicit comment and suggests some profitable lines of inquiry in his article. Tracy's article (19) on the prophetic assurance as line of progress for the hero and his epic is interesting and valid. L. A. MacKay's article (20) was summarized in abstract form in Vergilius 10 (1964) 41 and now appears under a new title in toto. Most valuable is his proper verdict that the Aeneid's central theme is a mythical counterpart of Caesar's civil war, and that Vergil has provided us with an imaginative study of the moral dilemma of men and societies in a universe frequently indifferent, sometimes even hostile, to moral action.

Johnson (21) provides a careful study of pietas with its various significances of 'compassion' and 'duty to countrymen and friends,' and of ira, habitual foe of pietas. Aeneas, Johnson argues, struggles gamely to support all the claims of pietas but ultimately himself yields to anger, and finally kills Turnus out of despair. Bovie (22) argues that the descriptive imagery and symbolic significance attaching to human hands helps to illuminate the meaning of Aeneas' quest and the positive and responsible actions to which his character and his destiny have committed him. The words manus and tendo in Aeneas' case and in connection with others, configure the dynamic sense of longing found everywhere in Vergil's work. The whole metaphorical range of the word manus and its connotations is discovered to be operating in the epic and constitutes only one of several poetic means by which Vergil keeps his poem alive. Halter (23) and Becker (33) both examine rhythm and structure and accentuate the unique Roman qualities in the design of the two passages under discussion. Dido's book claims the lion's share of attention from recent scholarship. Quinn (24) and Schmitz (25) explore the accepted masterpiece from the standpoint of structure and narrative technique, and in Schmitz's instance, from the standpoint of character, and the psychological mainsprings of the thoughts and actions of the Tragic Queen. Hornsby (26) in a superb lecture examines the similes that describe Dido to determine how they interpret and estimate her character and actions. The similes shed light not just on her passion and its relation to previous 'literary' counterparts, but also by their effective use of crucial stages in the dramatic development, curiously underline her inability to distinguish between appearance and reality, a failing which ultimately destroys her. Vergil's similes repeatedly point up a similarity and a crucial disparity too between Dido and the terms of the simile. In this disparity lies the poet's estimate of the reason for her failure and her death. Madeline Covi (27) tracks the tragic passion of Dido as it is contained in the epithets, allusions, and her actual appearances throughout the Aeneid. Dido emerges as a symbol of the classical idea of the disaster which attends the defeat of reason by passion, and of the ruin which overwhelms someone like Dido (and even Aeneas) when personal factors take precedence over the public good. Phinney's article (28) sets Dido's career into a larger context with that of Hypsipyle, who loved Jason unwisely but without feelings of guilt or surrender to fits of hatred, and of Medea, who struggled between love of Jason and the honor which she owed to her father Aeetes. Dido's guilt or culpa lay in her breach of loyalty to the memory of Sychaeus, ironically the mythical aition for Carthaginian perfidy. Lees (29) finds that action and expression in Shakespeare's Tempest are often paralleled in Marlowe's Dido and Vergil's Aeneid. Book Six engages three scholars. Skard (30) comments on the heroic march-past in Hades, Kraggerud (31) is concerned with the parallelisms between Dido 'consumed by wasting love' and the catalogue of heroines (440-49) in whose company she appears. Though rather involved and artificial, Kraggerud finds etymological reasons for a parallel between Dido and Caenis-Caeneus, and recalls earlier expressions in the epic and mythical situations which provide a proper context for the other heroines and Dido.

Mörland (32) examines Aeneid 6, 601-7, and 616-20 for the significance of names and etymological epithets in the lines. Mörland underscores an important part of the Vergilian imaginative process which Jackson Knight analysed briefly but suggestively in Roman Vergil (London, 1944) 197ff, namely Vergil's interest in etymology and its often surprising uses.

TEXTS AND TRANSLATIONS

34. Charles Jenney Jr., and Rogers V. Scudder, Fourth Year Latin. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 1964.
35. L. P. Wilkinson, 'Copa Today,' G&R 12 (1965) 38-41.
36. F. R. D. Goodyear (ed.), Incerti Auctoris Aetna. With an Introduction and Commentary (Cambridge Classical Texts and Commentaries, 2). Cambridge University Press, 1965.
37. John Cunningham (tr.), revised by Addington Symonds, Virgil, The Aeneis. Edited with an Introduction by Wendell Clausen. ('A Washington Square Press Edition' W-513). New York; Washington Square Press, 1965.

The Jenney and Scudder text (34) provides the student with Aeneid 1-6 entire, Aeneid 8 entire, and selections from the other books. Notes appear at the foot of the page, and a vocabulary is also included. The editors have also inserted interesting selections from Ovid, Catullus, and Horace, frequently treating themes comparable to Vergil's, and offering useful comparative material. Wilkinson's (35) critical comments and amusing contemporary version of the Copa (Appendix Vergiliana) offers clever insight into a tantalizing piece of verse. Wilkinson accepts the poem as a congeries of pastoral and popular Epicurean motifs with strong Greek connections, and having a setting probably somewhere in South Italy near Naples. Goodyear's edition of the Aetna (36) examines the problem of Vergilian authorship and sheds light on many other problems in and around this much contested text. Conington's translation of the Aeneid (37) is admirably introduced by Wendell Clausen. Copley's version of the Aeneid, published by Bobbs-Merrill, is forthcoming.

GENERAL STUDIES

38. Clarence W. Mendell, Latin Poetry: The New Poets, and the Augustans. New Haven, Connecticut, and London: Yale University Press, 1965.
39. Tenney Frank, Vergil, A Biography. New York: Russell & Russell, 1965. (Originally published 1922, by Henry Holt, New York).
40. John S. Coolidge, 'Great Things and Small. The Vergilian Progression.' Comparative Literature 17 (1965) 1-23.
41. J. Le Grelle, S. J., 'Nombres virgiliens: antécédents littéraires et présupposés mathématiques,' LEC 33 (1965) 52-63.
42. M. Sordi, 'Virgilio e la storia romana del IV sec. A.C.' Athenaeum 42 (1964) 80-100.
43. A. Grisart, 'Asinius Pollion commentateur de Virgile,' Athenaeum 42 (1964) 447-88.
44. E. de Saint Denis, 'Le Sourire de Virgile,' Latomus 23 (1964) 446-63.
45. J. Perret, 'L'Amour romanesque chez Virgile,' Maia 17 (1965) 3-18.
46. J. Perret, 'Amour et mariage dans l'épisode de Didon,' Hommages à Jean Bayet, Bruxelles, 1964, 538-43.

47. Vincenz Buchheit, "Tibull II. 5, und die Aeneis," Philologus 109 (1965) 104-20.
 48. Mario A. DiCesare, Vida's Christiad and Vergilian Epic. New York and London: Columbia University Press, 1964.

Mendell (38) offers nine essays on Latin poetry, from the Poetae Novi to Ovid. He still accepts most of the Vergilian Appendix as authentic Vergil although most scholars regard most of the poems, except for certain of the Catalepton, as post-Vergilian imitations. Mendell's study of Vergil is more concerned with poetic structure and the frame of a poem or incident than with language. Perhaps it is relevant to recall a remark made by Mendell's colleague at Yale, Henri Peyre, to the effect that the so-called New Critics 'seem able to look at one another without laughing.' Tenney Frank's excellent biography (39) has been republished to the great advantage of students of Vergil. Coolidge (40) finds an even more general design in Vergil's output than progression of genres from Pastoral to Epic in the poet's remarkable use of the familiar phrase 'to compare great things with small.' Vergil is able to project the relationship of great things and small into a conception of the nature of change and it becomes a vital principle of the great plan which emerges from his work, to justify the processes of time to man. Milton uses the same traditional phrase and draws this central element in Vergil's writing into the even more comprehensive design of Christian humanism. Le Grelle's (41) further remarks on the Golden Section, numerology, and the like, provides precedents for Vergil's otherwise surprising practice. The review is actually written as an extended critique of Brown's recent Numeri Vergiliani. Studies in 'Eclogues' and 'Georgics' (Collection Latomus 63) 1963. Sordi (42) approaches the Vergilian 'Iliad' for insight into fourth century history, particularly the siege of Veii and the Gallic invasion, and their aftermath. Grisart (43) examines Pollio's role as influence and commentator on Vergil in a most enlightening fashion. Saint Denis (44) concentrates on humor in Vergil, an element which critics usually overlook or deny. Perret's articles (45, 46) examines the rapture of love in Vergil both in the Eclogues (2 & 8) and Aeneid (1-4). Though particularly concerned with the relationship between Dido and Aeneas, Perret also enlarges his discussion to treat the Catullan concept of the Puella Divina, a lover's concept which condemns a man to melancholy but generates great undertakings as a kind of compensation for disappointment or disenchantment. Perret used 'romanesque' to describe the Vergilian concept which also has elements in common with the Platonic tradition and with the mystery cults. Di Cesare (48) argues that Vida's Christiad is basically Vergilian because it is a 'symbolic or reflective epic' where theme is more important than narrative and character. There is a striking analogy between Vida's Christian approach and Vergil's treatment of the theme of exile, of the establishment of Rome, and of the Golden Age.

A. G. McKay

McMaster University
 September, 1965

ADDENDA

The following titles have come to my attention since the completion of the survey article.

49. Vincent Cleary, 'Aeneas: A Study in Alternation,' CB 40 (1964) 85-7.
50. Van L. Johnson, 'Personal Quality of Vergil's Art,' CB 41 (1964) 17-26.
51. M. Owen Lee, 'Virgil as Orpheus,' Orpheus 11 (1964) 9-18.
52. William R. Nethercut, 'Vergil's Dove,' CB 41 (1965) 65-8.
53. Keith Stanley, 'Irony and Foreshadowing in Aeneid I, 462,' AJP 86 (1965) 267-77.
54. M. Von Albrecht, 'Die Kunst der Spiegelung in Vergils Aeneis,' Hermes 93 54-64.

October, 1965

A. G. M.