

VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY, 1965-6

Author(s): A. G. McKay

Source: Vergilius (1959-), 1966, No. 12 (1966), pp. 39-45

Published by: The Vergilian Society

Stable URL: <https://www.jstor.org/stable/41591603>

JSTOR is a not-for-profit service that helps scholars, researchers, and students discover, use, and build upon a wide range of content in a trusted digital archive. We use information technology and tools to increase productivity and facilitate new forms of scholarship. For more information about JSTOR, please contact support@jstor.org

Your use of the JSTOR archive indicates your acceptance of the Terms & Conditions of Use, available at <https://about.jstor.org/terms>

JSTOR

The Vergilian Society is collaborating with JSTOR to digitize, preserve and extend access to Vergilius (1959-)

VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY, 1965-6

ECLOGUES

1. Segal, Charles P., 'Tamen cantabitis Arcades — Exile and Arcadia in Eclogues One and Nine,' Arion 4:2 (1965) 237-66.
2. Fredericksmeier, E. A., 'Octavian and the Unity of Virgil's First Eclogue,' Hermes 94 (1966) 208-218.
3. Grisart, A., 'Tityre et son dieu: des identifications nouvelles,' LEC 34 (1966) 115-42.
4. Wilkinson, L. P., 'Virgil and the Evictions,' Hermes 94 (1966) 320-4.
5. Vanderlinden, E., 'La dépossession de Virgile,' LEC 34 (1966) 35-8.
6. Coleman, Robert, 'Tityrus and Meliboeus,' G&R 13 (1966) 79-97.
7. Putnam, M. C. J., 'The Riddle of Damoetas (Virgil Ecl. 3, 104-105),' Mnemosyne 18 (1965) 150-4.
8. Dahlmann, H., 'Zu Vergils siebentem Hirtengedicht,' Hermes 94 (1966) 218-32.
9. Levi, P., 'The Dedication to Pollio in Virgil's Eighth Eclogue,' Hermes 94 (1966) 73-79.
10. Fantazzi, Charles, 'Virgilian Pastoral and Roman Love Poetry,' AJP 87 (1966) 171-91.

Segal (1) shows greater concern with the poetic quality of the poems than with the location of the farm, the tangled probably insoluble problem of the confiscation and restoration of the property. His detailed analysis of Eclogues 1 and 9 as pendants to each other discovers, inter alia, shadowy elements even in Arcadia. What Panofsky has called the 'vespertinal mixture of sadness and tranquillity' exists in Vergil's repeated theme of exile from a peaceful, familiar world, and constitutes Vergil's most personal contribution to poetry. Fredericksmeier (2) is not ready to accept Eclogue 1 as an outright eulogy of Octavian. He finds the poem ambivalent in its view of Octavian; his past acts are assessed as productive of both good and evil, but he also emerges as a saviour, a force for good, and a source of hope for the future.

The familiar identification of Tityrus with Vergil, and the iuvenis deus with Octavian, in Eclogue 1 is challenged by Grisart (3). His novel interpretation discovers a double objective: a masque involving Vergil and the youth Eros, combined with a dramatised complaint against expropriation of farms to compensate the veterans. Wilkinson (4) examines Eclogues 1 and 9 in the light of pastoral conventions. Allegorical interpretations are regularly embarrassed by the desire to make all the details fit. In fact Vergil's Eclogues are Theocritean pastorals with occasional outcroppings of reality. Wilkinson's article, though abbreviated, will serve as a corrective to H. J. Rose's literal-mindedness in the criticism of the Bucolics, and as a useful corollary to some of Vanderlinden's views (5). Coleman's article (6) avoids the biographical approach to the criticism of the Eclogues. The intrusion of the socio-political crisis is, in Coleman's view, original with Vergil. By merging conventional Arcadia with this novel element, Vergil gave pastoral poetry a new dimension. Criticism of the Eclogues, with Brooks Otis providing direction and challenge, has entered upon bright new paths. Putnam's (7) ingenious interpretation and solution of the riddle of Damoetas deserves careful thought. Dahlmann's study (8) of the seventh Eclogue marks some progress on the road to elucidation but the argument is sometimes obscure and oblivious of important factors raised by Otis' study. Levi's (9) concern with recent structural studies of the Eclogues in their entirety brought him to review Eclogue 8, 6-13. Textual and other factors, including the failure to cite Pollio by name as the poem's recipient, induce Levi to accept only 11-13 as genuine. Fantazzi's article (10) is a reduction of findings in his doctoral thesis, The Vergilian Version of Pastoral (Harvard, 1964). Vergil revived the Theocritean dramatic form and Arcadian setting but largely eliminated the exuberance and fervour of subjective love-poetry in an idealized world of song. The passion and the vicissitudes of elegiac love poetry were, in Vergil's view, anomalous in the pastoral tranquillity of his new Arcadia. Eclogue 10, to Cornelius Gallus, helps one to demarcate the two poetic forms and moods and reminds one of the pastoral break with passion.

GEORGICS

11. Buchheit, Vinzenz, 'Vergil in Sorge um Oktavian,' Rh. Mus. 109 (1966) 78-83.
12. Abbe, E., The Plants of Virgil's Georgics. Commentary and woodcuts. Ithaca, 1965.
13. Morford, Mark P. O., 'Bruegel and the First Georgic,' G&R 13 (1966) 50-3.
14. Volkmann, H., 'Zu Gallus-Inschrift auf dem Vatikanischen Obelisk,' Gymnasium 72 (1965) 328-30.
 Highet, C., Franz Bömer, 'Noch einmal die Gallus-Inschrift auf dem Vatikanischen Obelisk,' Gymnasium 73 (1966) 240.

Catullan influence on Vergil's epic has received considerable notice in the past. Buchheit (11) has discovered fresh instances of influence in the Georgics. Catullus 64 (35-42; 22-4; 394-9; 405-6) clearly affected Vergil's craft and emotion in Georgics 1, 498ff. Further study along these lines, with careful and imaginative attention to the implications of the influence, and with due regard to metrics, word order, etc. is greatly to be desired. Miss Abbe's study of plants (12) emerges from the Department of Botany at Cornell University. Though delightful to handle, and a masterful survey of plant-lore with careful study of the survivals and parallels in modern Italian flora, the volume must be expanded to include plants from the Eclogues and the Aeneid. Breughel's landscape painting, 'The Fall of Icarus' in Morford's view (12) is a marvelous combination of Ovidian detail and Vergilian spirit. Product of Breughel's sojourn in Italy (1552-4) the painting, whether consciously or not, provides a composite expression of the underlying theme of the Georgics. The Vergilian tradition in Renaissance and later landscape and mythological painting needs attention. Dürer, Breughel, Elsheimer, Claude and Poussin, Corot and Blake, all share elements of the Vergilian landscape, the myth of ideal rusticity. Sir Kenneth Clark has defined the Ideal or Vergilian landscape as 'essentially an evocation of the antique world, with all its fullness of life and its confidence in the body, but also with some qualities which the ancient world lacked, some half-lights, some backward glances.' (Landscape into Art. London, 1949. p. 55). The Gallus inscription found recently on the Vatican obelisk in St. Peter's Square continues to excite discussion. (14). Gilbert Highet has challenged the earlier interpretations which located the obelisk in Egypt (Heliopolis) when Gallus added the inscription. Gallus' title, PRAEFECTUS FABRUM, in conjunction with the phrase, FORUM JULIUM FECIT, might best attach to Gallus' role as architect of the Forum Julium in Rome, completed by Augustus (cf. Mon. Anc. 20, 12-4). FECIT, rather than the normal PERFECIT, may exemplify the vanity which finally brought Gallus to ruin and suicide. It is also highly unlikely, in Highet's view, that the colony of Forum Julium (mod. Fréjus) is implied, or that Gallus, as Governor of Egypt, would refer to himself, in an Egyptian context, merely as Praefectus Fabrum, particularly when he felt emboldened to call himself elsewhere, in the Philae inscription (ILS 8995) PRAEFECTUS ALEXANDREAE ET AEGYPTII PRIMUS. Gallus' unquiet ghost keeps coming back to excite the archaeologist as it once excited Vergil and the Augustan elegists.

AENEID

15. Jones, J. W. Jr., 'Trojan Legend: Who is Sinon?' CJ 61 (1965-6) 122-28.
16. Lacroix, Léon, 'La légende de Philoctète en Italie méridionale,' Rev. Belge de Phil. et d'Hist. 43 (1965) 5-21.
17. Stocker, A. F. and A. H. Travis, Servianorum in Vergilii carmina commentariorum editionis Harvardianae volumen iii (Aeneid III-V). Oxford, 1965.
18. Tilley, Bertha, Vergil: Aeneid V (Palatine Classics), London, 1966.
19. Smerdel, T., 'La scena tragica di Palinuro,' Ziva Antika 2 (1966) 359-64.
20. Segal, Charles P., 'Aeternum Per Saecula Nomen, The Golden Bough and the Tragedy of History, Part I,' Arion 4:4 (1965) 617-57.
21. Avery, William T., 'The reluctant golden bough,' CJ 61 (1965-6) 269-72.
22. Kienast, D., 'Rom und die Venus vom Eryx,' Hermes 93 (1965) 478-89.
23. Holloway, W. Ross, 'The Tomb of Augustus and the Princes of Troy,' AJA 70 (1966) 171-3.
24. Galinsky, G. Karl, 'Venus in a Relief of the Ara Pacis Augustae,' AJA 70 (1966) 223-43.
25. Herrmann, L., 'Le 'puer' du sixième chant de l'Énéide,' Latomus 24 (1965) 421-2.
26. Galinsky, G. Karl, 'The Hercules-Cacus Episode in Aeneid VIII,' AJP 87 (1966) 18-51.
27. McGushin, P., 'Aeneas' Lasting City,' Latomus 24 (1965) 411-20.
28. Reynen, H., 'Ewiger Frühling und goldene Zeit. Zum Mythos des goldenen Zeitalters bei Ovid und Vergil,' Gymnasium 72 (1965) 415-33.

29. Williams, R. D., 'Aeneid 11. 400-409,' CP 61 (1966) 184-6.
30. Wittenburg, Sister Mary Ste. Therese, S.N.D., 'Vergil's Camilla,' CB 42 (1966) 69-71.
31. Owens, Sister M. Lilliana, S. L., 'Comprehensiveness and Purpose in the Aeneis,' CB 42 (1966) 87-89.

Sinon, monster of insinuating duplicity, in Jones' view (15) was Vergil's creation (Aen. 2, 57-198). But Homer's Odyssey 8, 494, implies that a Sinon-like character existed in the earliest known stages of the Trojan legend, with a role as climactic as the Wooden Horse of Epeios. Vergil's model was almost certainly Odysseus as delineated in Euripides' (now lost) Philoctetes. (The pendant to the Sinon incident, the Achaemenides episode, finds its inspiration in the same play). Lacroix's (16) study of the Philoctetes (and Epeios) legends in Magna Graecia provides useful expansion of Helenus' advice to Aeneas (Aen. 3, 402) that Philoctetes had established himself at Petelia in South Italy (cf. Strabo 6, 254). The indispensable Servius commentary (17), under new editorial direction, provides authentic and enlightening material (and asides) for students of Vergil. Bertha Tilly (18) widely respected for her useful topographical studies of places in the Aeneid, provides a compact and thoughtful school edition of Aeneid V. On the whole, R. D. Williams' recent text and commentary (Oxford, 1962) provides a better balanced and more scholarly commentary, but for the final year of High School and the first year of College Bertha Tilly's text will serve admirably. Palinurus' unquiet grave on 'A shelfy Coast,/ long infamous for Ships, and Sailors lost;/ and white with Bones' in Dryden's version, has a fascination for readers and critics of Vergil. Smerdel (19) has discovered a basically tragic structure and design to the episode, and a marked divergence by Vergil from the undoubted model, Eleonor's story, in Homer's Odyssey 10, 552-60. Segal's (20) study is even more suggestive, and actually explores the implications of Palinurus' demise in a larger framework. Concerned initially with the complex symbolism of the Golden Bough, Segal has endeavoured to penetrate the mystery attaching to the talisman, its relationship to Misenus, and the tragic and other-worldly associations with both Daedalus and Palinurus. The second part of this study is eagerly awaited. Avery (21), less concerned than some scholars with the use of cunctantem when Aeneas' plucks the Golden Bough (Aen. 6, 211; contra 6, 143-8), pleads for what should seem obvious to more critics. The Aeneid is after all a poem, a work of art, not a laboratory report, and consequently requires less stringent analysis. Cult and monument have received their share of attention recently. Kienast's study (22) of the Venus Erycina cult, combined with new finds at Segesta, further enlarges the implications of the death and funeral rites of a heroized Anchises at Drepanum. The tumular burials of Polydorus, Misenum, and Caieta have often been aligned with the Mausoleum of Augustus in the Campus Martius. Holloway (23) instances a Homeric parallel in the projected tumulus of Hector in the Troad, to be set in full view of the ships passing through the Dardanelles. He rejects the Etruscan mounded tombs as the inspiration for the Augustan family tomb, and favours the 'heroic' versions adopted by the epic poets, including Vergil, as the propaganda-laden models for a 'Trojan' Augustus. Scholars have frequently detected structural and illustrative parallels between the Aeneid and the Augustan Ara Pacis. Henning Malmström's Ara Pacis and Vergil's Aeneid: A Comparative Study (Malmö, 1963) even suggested that the march-past of Roman heroes-to-come in Anchises' review (Aen. 6) found a direct reflection, even identification, in the historical relief processions on the Augustan monument. Galinsky's article (24) finds reason to identify the Tellus or Italia panel with Venus, called Aeneadum genetrix by Lucretius, and in Italy customarily identified with natural and garden fertility. He provides several convincing illustrations from the text of the Aeneid to support his claim. Herrmann (25) find additional reasons to identify the 'puer' of Eclogue 4 ('Messianic') with the short-lived Marcellus in Aeneid 6. Galinsky (26) discovers three functions in the Hercules-Cacus episode in Aeneid 8: to echo and foreshadow various motifs of other books and so to help unify the epic; by parallels of imagery, language, symbolism and occasionally theme to link the 'volcanic' episode to Aeneid 2 and to Aeneid 12, for Hercules and Cacus surely foreshadow Aeneas and Turnus; and finally, by reason of the relationship between Books 6 and 8, closer than that between 2 and 4, to aid and abet the structure of the Aeneid as a trilogy. The Golden Age has received careful study from two scholars, an Australian (27) and a German (28). The Golden Age, when man lived on the fruits of the earth, in peace and piety, and with primitive simplicity, was a preoccupying theme with the Augustan poets. Reynen (28) shows how Ovid and Vergil viewed this ideal paradise, lost and regained with the advent of Augustus. McGushin (27) shows that the ideal of wealth, and repeated emphasis on gold, feature in the description of all the cities encountered by Aeneas save one, the simple settlement of Arcadian Evander at Pallanteum. Aeneas gradually realises that a material city (moenia) and material power are not enough. Simplicity, endurance, and the Saturnian mores are more important and durable than the splendour, comfort, and enervating atmosphere of wealth and prosperity. Williams (29) offers a new interpretation of Turnus' reply to Drances. He excludes Aen. 11, 404 (cf. Aen. 2, 197) as an inappropriate remark for Turnus; but he regards the Aufidus allusion as extremely pertinent to Turnus, for his homeland, before Ardea, was the territory of Daunus where the obstreperous Aufidus (cf. Horace, Odes 3, 30, 10) was not likely to run backwards.

APPENDIX VERGILIANA, VITAE

32. Clausen, W. V., F. R. D. Goodyear, E. J. Kenney, J. A. Richmond, Appendix Vergiliana. Oxford, 1966. (Oxford Classical Text).
33. Giorgio Brugnoli - Riccardo Scarcia, 'Osservazioni sulla 'Vita Probiana' di Virgilio,' Studi Urbinati 39 (1965) 18-46.

A quartet of editors (32) has produced a new edition to replace Ellis' Appendix Vergiliana (1907). The styles of the individual poets (there is no single authorship) are carefully reviewed. Aetna is included; the Vitae Vergilianae are to appear in a separate volume. The preface and notes are in Latin. The Vita Probiana (33) has been subjected to a careful study with particular attention to Pietole-Andes, the poet's birthplace, the mother's name, Magia Polla, etc.

GENERAL STUDIES, REVIEWS, TRANSLATIONS

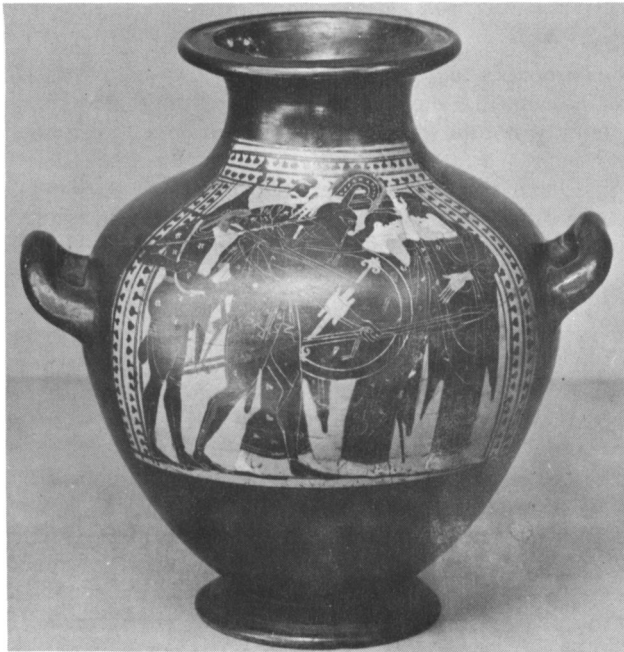

34. Conrad, C. W., 'Traditional Patterns of Word-Order in Latin Epic from Ennius to Vergil,' HSCP 69 (1965) 195-258.
35. Pearce, T. E. V., 'The Enclosing Word Order in the Latin Hexameter, I,' CQ 16 (1966) 140-71.
36. Duckworth, George E., 'Variety and Repetition in Vergil's Hexameters' TAPA 95 (1964) 9-65.
37. Perret, Jacques, Virgile. Paris, 1965. Second edition.
38. Segal, Charles P., rev. Brooks Otis, Virgil, a Study in Civilized Poetry (Oxford, 1963) Arion 4:1 (1965) 126-49.
39. Duckworth, George E., rev. Brooks Otis, Virgil, a Study in Civilized Poetry (Oxford, 1963), CP 60 (1965) 409-20.
40. Bruère, Richard T., rev. Mario A. Di Cesare, Vida's "Christiad" and Vergilian Epic (New York, 1964), CP 61 (1966) 21-43.
41. Copley, F. O., Vergil, Aeneid: a verse translation, with an introduction by Brooks Otis. Indianapolis, 1965.
42. Reinhold, Meyer, Barron's Simplified Approach to Vergil: Eclogues, Georgics, Aeneid. New York, 1966. (Barron's Educational Series).

The patterns of word order and the distribution of dactyls and spondees in the hexameter line have become increasingly important factors in the study of structure in the works of Vergil, particularly in the Aeneid. Conrad (34) and Pearce (35) follow comparable lines of research. Conrad's survey is more historical. He shows that there was a tradition of word-order in Latin hexameter poetry going back to Homer. He also shows how each of the patterns of separation of substantive and attribute is formed, and what effects it makes. Vergil, among the Roman poets, proved most loyal to Homer; like Horace he was ready to appropriate a tradition, to master the inherited forms and express his own national and personal character through them. Duckworth's researches (35), amplified in this volume of Vergilius, deal with metrical procedures, with the frequencies of sixteen metrical patterns, and with the frequencies of repeated, opposite, and reverse patterns in adjacent lines. His major finds are e.g., the Catullan nature of Eclogue 4, and the surprising manner in which Aeneid 10-12 differ metrically from the rest of the epic. The lack of metrical variety in the last three books, and the use of adjacent patterns which are vastly different from those found elsewhere in Vergil's poetry suggest to Duckworth that although by 19 B.C. the necessary metrical revisions had progressed through Aeneid 9, the curious and unusual feature of a metrical variety in the remaining books are the mark of Vergil's failure to revise them before his death. Such a conclusion has far-reaching importance for students of epic composition. The Perret study (37) has been revised and eight new plates added. The literary criticism, particularly of the Eclogues, marks a sensitive, penetrating incursion into the old hunting ground. The Eclogues still constitute an important gap in Vergilian scholarship, as does the post-Renaissance tradition of Vergil. Segal's (38) and Duckworth's (39) reviews of Brooks Otis' Virgil: A Study in Civilized Poetry are comprehensive and instructive. Bruère's (40) review article of de Cesare's study of the Christiad by Vida is masterly and enlightening. Copley's new verse translation of the Aeneid (41) is a line-for-line version based on the English iambic pentameter, but with free substitution of anapaestic, dactylic, and even trochaic feet for iambs. Not words but ideas are the translator's aim in a version that has aimed to preserve dignity, clarity, and immediate comprehensibility in a compressed style. In reaction probably to the C. Day Lewis version, Copley claims that 'every effort has been made to avoid the witty and mannered, the outré and archaic, except where a truly ancient or fantastic idea seemed to demand such expression.' Otis' introduction is relevant and significant. Three maps and a glossary assist the reader.

A. G. McKay

McMaster University,
September, 1966.

Black-Figured Hydria, showing Aeneas bearing Anchises from Troy.
Courtesy Montreal Museum of Fine Arts.