VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1981-82

The present survey of Vergilian scholarship is the twentieth in the Vergilius series. Classical World 68:1 (1974), published in association with the Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my 'Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographical Survey, 1964-73.' The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil (Walter Donlan, ed.), Garland Publishing, Inc. (New York and London 1978). Subsequent reviews have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973), 20 (1974), 21 (1975), 22 (1976), 23 (1977), 24 (1978), 25 (1979), 26 (1980), and 27 (1981).

The Vergilian Bimillennium (19 B.C. - A.D. 1982) has excited scholars to renewed enthusiasm for the Master Poet. Special symposia and colloquia have celebrated the event in Europe, the United Kingdom, and North America with generous outpourings of articles and addresses in their train. We await the publication of proceedings of several gatherings in Mainz, Prague, Mantua, Rome, Naples, and Cumae (The Vergilian Society's event).

The present compilation owes much to the assistance and cooperation of the Mills Memorial Library of McMaster University, to the Robarts Library of the University of Toronto, to the library of the American Academy in Rome, and to the Carolinum Library in Prague. Offprints of articles and bibliographic notices for inclusion in the annual Vergilius review are welcomed with enthusiasm and scholars are asked to send material to the editor of Vergilian Bibliography, c/o Department of Classics, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada L8S 4M2.

Several collections of essays relating to the anniversary celebrations have appeared and give evidence of fresh departures in Vergilian criticism along with careful criticism of past exercises. Chevallier's volume (2) contains a varied repertoire (abbrev. Colloque l'épopée), as does Gigante's well organized collection of essays on the Eclogues (abbrev.: Gigante). The Cambridge History of Classical Literature contains essays by W. V. Clausen (Theocritus and Virgil), L. P. Wilkinson (The Georgics), and R. D. Williams (The Aeneid). Suerbaum's reflections on recent studies of the epic are an outgrowth of his monumental bibliographical study. Della Corte's protean Enciclopedia Virgilliana has published a sample fascicle which serves as splendid prelude to a promising enterprise, as meaningful and exciting as Lexicon Iconographicum Mythologiae Classicae, another goldmine of fact and bibliography.

Coleiro's edition and commentary continues to earn the gratitude of Vergilians for clear definition of problems and reporting of solutions and interpretations affecting the Bucolics. Fitzgerald's verse translation appears in a promising fragment. Deryck Williams' Macmillan edition of 'Page's' abiding Eclogues and Georgics continues to find favor with scholars who regret the constricted format but respect the views of an experienced commentator.

23. Otto Skutsch, 'Numbers in Virgil's Bucolics,' BICS 27 (1980) 95-6.

Conte, inter alia, examines programmatic proems at midpoint in Virgil's several works. The Danaid myth on Pallas' swordbelt (Aen. 10.496ff) Conte regards as accenting the pathos of Pallas' missed marriage; and the Helen episode, modelled after Achilles' quarrel with Agamemnon (Iliad 1), features Venus as Athena's counterpart, Conte argues, and so supports authenticity (pace Goold, HSCP 74 [1970] 101-68). Horsfall's article refers to both Eclogues and Georgics (108-9). Segal's essays are reprints of earlier offerings. Otto Skutsch responds to David West (CR 28 [1978] 77f) and continues to detect arithmetical structure in the Eclogue-Book.

45. Stephanie West, 'Some watchers of the skies,' CQ 32 (1982) 121-3.

Brenk refers to Diotimos (A.P. 7.261) and Homer (Iliad 11.91-100) in his interpretation of the complex, mysterious Bianor in Eclogue 9. Campbell's solution of the riddle of Damoetas is persuasive. Keppie's study of the confiscation suggests that colonists at Cremona may have included members of Caesar's old Legio X, along with veterans from another legion, maybe Legio II or (more likely) Legio XV. Certainly the settlers on Vergil's terrain were neither barbarous mercenaries nor foreign mercenaries. Veyne treats Tityrus' peculium and Eclogues I and IX. Stephanie West examines Eclogues 3.40-42 and Aen. 6.849-50 and identifies radius (from analogies in Avienus, Arat. 53-4, and Catullus 66.1ff.) as a surveying instrument.

Bandera notices that hardly any violent death in the epic lacks some sacrificial overtones, some echo of the unum pro multis formula. Creusa, Orontes, and Palinurus are sacrificial prelude to the symbolic descent of Aeneas and to the awful violence ahead on Italian soil. Briggs studies Vergil's design in employing repetitions to unite the Georgics and Aeneid by themes and language. Dirckx deals with Aeneid 3.137-42 and Georgics 2.151-2, and Aeneid 12.383-429 in his medical study. Griffin attacks the validity of a typological approach to the Aeneid. Holt treats dual perspective as a pervasive feature of the epic. Rudd's memoir of T. S. Page, the Macmillan editor, scholar, and controversialist, includes a comparison of Page's edition of Vergil and Horace with those of forerunners and successors. Suerbaum's assessment of Vergil's place in the classroom and seminar includes studies of the end of the epic (46-103), and of the contest of Aeneas and Turnus and readers' reactions (104-125); a select bibliography is included (144-147). Deryck Williams' presidential address to the British Classical Association considers the multiplicity of Vergil's poetic abilities, surface and underlying qualities, the sound factor and descriptive power of Vergil, his high-powered and intense rhetoric, along with inner, deeper qualities of the poem.

De Grummond examines Vergil's feelings at the close of the epic in light of Juno's feelings at the outset. Juno's enduring, destructive wrath and resentment, born of hatred, and self-love, initiate the poem's movement. Aeneas' quick, accelerating wrath, and resentment, born of his love for others, terminates the action; his acceptance of necessity leads to the resolution, and to general prosperity. Kinsey interprets Troianus . . . Caesar (1.286) as implying Augustus; and argues that Sidon was the dominant partner (with Tyre) for Vergil. Segal's examination of Iopas' song responds to Kinsey (Emerita 47, 1979, 77-86) and argues that 'symbolic' meaning should not be conceived too narrowly; neither literalism, nor allegory, is a valid approach to Iopas' song. Cleary offers exciting suggestions for a sound and slide presentation of Aeneid 2 in conjunction with Picasso's masterpiece. Edgeworth examines colour terms. Bright studies the sequence of events and patterns of Odyssey 9-12 and Aeneid 3. The visit to Buthrotum claims major notice as a nekyia (Helenus = Teiresias) in its own right. Estevez argues that Jupiter's reaction (Aeneid 4.220) is marked by hasty intemperance and a fall from grace. Jocelyn studies the text and interprets Macrobius Sat. 3.2.7-9. Kinsey (91) studies Dido's references to fides and dextra (Aen. 4.307, 314, 597) and detaches them from any allusion to marriage. They refer to the obligations Aeneas contracted when he accepted Dido's hospitality. Houston studies Vergil's account of the Lusus Troiae and Augustan policy. Tarrant examines the Platonic factor in the Gates of Sleep. Yardley detects a sarcastic allusion to the komos in Menelaus amans (Aen. 6.523-6); Deiphobus casts Menelaus in the role of admissus amans and himself as cuckolded husband; hence limini (526) belongs not to the thalamus of Deiphobus and Helen but to the house. Falkner shows how parallels between the vision of Hector and the Deiphobus episode enable Vergil to highlight fundamental differences between Aeneid 2 and 8. The second interview assures Aeneas that he has rendered full duty to his fatherland, and that to have done more was impossible. Johnston examines the tidal wave structure of Aeneid 7 and detects a sequence whereby a peaceful people is converted into a race of warriors. 'The pattern drawn from the physical world may be viewed as an exemplum in parvo of the tragic, metaphysical storm which rises out of Aeneid VII.' (29). Glazewski treats the catalogue in Aeneid 7; Rowland explores catalogues and lists in Aeneid 7 and 8, and is concerned with Aeneas' shield. Yardley's study of Evander's altum limen (Aen. 8.461-2) interprets the past-present contrast factor between Palatine mansions and Evander's lowly domicile. Toohey, inter alia, treats Evander's Arcadian (Aeolic Greek) tongue (261-3). Rabel is concerned with the tightly organized form of Aeneid 9 and its framework as suggested by Iliad 12. His earlier article (Vergilius 24, 1978, 37-44) examined structural similarities between both books; the more recent article is concerned with the incorporation of material from other books of the Iliad into that basic framework. Nielson's dissertation is a literary-critical analysis of Aeneid 11 concerned with structure, imagery, and characterization.

Baker's chapter is an incisive, helpful estimate of Ascanius' character with fresh insights. Burnell finds that brave men of Roman mythology tend to have a touch of Fabius Maximus in their makeup. Aeneas' thirst for death and bloodshed would have been a kind of heroism traditionally repellent to Romans. Fuqua illustrates the hold of the past and of traditional ideals on Aeneas. The mutilated figure illustrates a crisis in the traditional heroic code and underscores the need to transcend it in the future. La Penna's critical review of Mezentius studies is valuable. Lee, recently concerned with father-son relationships in the epic, embraces Palinurus and Iapyx, both brothers of Iasus, in a sympathetic study. Perkell is concerned with Dido's faulty commitment to a traditional Roman, and intractable ideal (pietas); her career is marked by a conflict of heroic aspiration with humanity. Wiltshire and Krickel examine Diomedes as a double for Aeneas, helping in the redefinition of heroism in Roman terms. The defeated Diomedes serves also as a model for benevolent, peaceful rulers of the sort that Aeneas and Augustus are meant to be.

The spectacular exhibition, Enea nel Lazio, produced a valuable catalogue and commentary on contentious issues pertaining to Vergil's Latium. Ingrid Edlund's article is required reading along with the catalogue. Goodfellow's essay on topographical (and poetical) features of the Georgics as outgrowth of Vergil's north Italian experience enriches understanding of the poems. Jucker's illustrated article on Apollo Palatinus and Apollo Actius illuminates Vergil's references to the Palatine temple and the Actian memorials. The marvelously illustrated articles relevant to Vergilian characters and sites in Volume I of Lexicon Iconographicum Mythologiae Classicae are authoritative and presage better things to come. Thomas' book makes available the content and argument of an earlier doctoral study. The Vatican exhibition of Vergilian books, mounted in connection with the bimillenary celebration, claims the attention of every earnest Vergilian.

Vergil and his time turned the term, Golden Age, inside out, according to Brenk. Eclogue IV reveals elements radically opposed to the Hesiodic concept; gold is an ambiguous symbol in the epic; and the Golden Age, as imposition of law and order on a somewhat recalcitrant world, gets only half-hearted support. Jacobson shows that Vergil has transformed a traditional hypothetical argument in philosophical discourse into a primeval historical event. Rabel views the top (Aen. 7.378-87) through Stoic eyes where Allecto is merely the proximate auxiliary cause of Amata's anger, the beginning of motion (acc. to Cicero's De Fato); otherwise she moves in accord with the force of her own bitter, angry nature.

Gallus and the new fragment captures the limelight again. D'Anna examines Eclogue 6.64-73, and 10.50-60. Graf, with Van Sickle, provides useful commentary and bibliography on work to date on the Gallus verses. Lee responds to Roland Meyer's disbelief with reference to Augustine, Confessions 6.6.9, relating to the syntax of Gallus. The contest is concerned with tu . . . pars erit, or eris.

170. R. D. Williams, 'Virgil, Aen. 6.304,' CQ 31 (1981) 469-70.

Pope adopts Janell's approach to Aen. 4.311, and admits no pause or interrogation after quid for reasons of sense and rhythm. Skutsch argues that commas should be placed around sed proximus (Aen. 5.320) in order to improve the sense. Skutsch explains the subjunctive in Aen. 6.394. Timpanaro offers an acute study of an oft-emended sentence of the Danieline scholium on Aen. 4.219 and offers a solution. Williams argues for retaining deo against Martin West's adeo (contained in a note on Hesiod, Works and Days, 705).

177. Paola Venini, 'Nota virgiliana (Aen. 1.81-86),' Athenaeum 59 (1981) 489.

Boella studies Vergil and Catullus 101 (324-6), and Vergil, Aen. 12.879-84 and Bion of Smyrna (326-8). Harrison underscores Vergil's originality in imitation accenting his deviations from Homeric models for striking effects, including oppositio. Vergil, the spokesman of the Aeneadae, corrects the tradition. Paratore studies Aeneid 9-12 in his review of war episodes in both poets. Venini aligns Iliad 23.212-216 with Aeneid 1.81-6.

183. Rick M. Newton, 'Trimalchio's Hellish Bath,' CJ 77 (1982) 315-9.

Polybius, freedman of Claudius, produced a Greek Vergil (probably Aeneid); Arrian, the epic poet, translated the Georgics into Greek hexameters; Constantine used a hexameter rendering of Eclogue 4. Baldwin's article adduces the evidence of extant papyrus texts to indicate that the poet's fame persisted in allusions into the mid-15th century. Horsfall notes a thematic reworking of Aeneid 1.34ff in Apuleius. Newton's article treats the catabasis motif in Satyricon 72 and suggests that Petronius intended the scene in Trimalchio's bath to recall Vergil's vision of the Elysian Fields. The comic inversion and incongruity are assessed: Encolpius, as an anti-Aeneas, Trimalchio as an unlikely Orpheus, and the guests, as heroes who fell at Troy.

ANCIENT LIVES

186. H. Naumann, 'Was wissen wir von Vergils Leben?,' AU 24:5 (1981) 5-16.

Naumann, in both English and German, argues that the Vergilian Vita of Donatus' commentary is the Life composed by Suetonius, and adduces facts and other considerations to support the verdict. Lipking's venturesome but uneven study is concerned with the life and personality of poets, including Vergil, with the biography that invades their poems. But there are some disturbing arguments: 'the death of Misenus stands for his city's cursed past which must be buried before the survivors can be reborn;' and Turnus is characterized as a 'stone-age savage' in a strained interpretation of Aeneid 12.896-8.

191. J. Rathofer, 'Litterae Vergilianae. Zur Farbbeilage aus dem Vergilius Vaticanus,' Eos 2 (1918) 25-6.

Gaebel shows that the relationship of two manuscripts, Vatican Palatinus lat. 1631 (P) and Guelferbytanus Gudianus lat. 2° 70 (gamma) is much less close than has been assumed by Ribbeck, Sabbadini, Mynors, and Geymonat. Gaebel examines four manuscripts for Bucolics 1-3, including Vat. lat. 3867 (R) of the fourth century, and Bernensis 172(a) of the ninth century. Georgics 4.1-225 is included in the examination with important conclusions. Courtney's article, after examining numerous instances of textual problems remarks that there is a need for frank acknowledgment of the existence of genuine difficulties in Vergil's text which require close study and a search for answers. 'These solutions . . . have in some cases come from scholars, such as Peerlkamp, whose names are hardly vogue words; but the fact that such scholars have made dozens of unwarranted suggestions does not absolve us from impartial consideration and recognition of their successes' (28).

The exhibition catalogue (198) illustrates Vergil's role in European art and cultural history: La fortuna di Virgilio attraverso le opere a stampa (9-24); La fortuna di Virgilio nella cultura Europea (25-62); La fortuna di Virgilio nell'arte (63-262), with lavish illustrations; and Bibliography (263-8). The catalogue provides splendid support for studies in Vergilian influence in several realms. Kaster studies Vergilian references in Macrobius' Saturnalia. Perkins and Reeves shed fresh light on T. S. Eliot's ties with Vergil. Draheim's invaluable study of Vergilian influence on musical compositions from the Baroque period to modern times lists works by Benjamin Britten, Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Charles Ives, Malipiero, Penderecki, Stravinsky, Richard Strauss, Liszt, the incomparable Mozart, Schubert, and others (30-32; 220-225; 261-2). R. D. Williams and T. S. Pattie (Assistant Keeper, Department of Manuscripts of the British Library) have collaborated to produce a critical reassessment of Vergil's poetry, with studies of the manuscript tradition, and of the immense influence of his poetry on succeeding generations of Latin and English poets, and on the popular imagination. Williams provides Part I: Virgil and his poetry; the poems; and Virgil today. A selective bibliography appears in the volume and appendices include details of Latin mss of Vergil in the British Library.
