VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1982-83

The present survey of Vergilian scholarship is the twenty-first in the Vergilius series. Classical World 68:1 (1974) published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my 'Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographical Survey, 1964-73'. The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil (Walter Donlan, ed.), Garland Publishing, Inc. (New York & London 1978). Subsequent reviews have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973), 20 (1974), 21 (1975), 22 (1976), 23 (1977), 24 (1978), 25 (1979), 26 (1980), 27 (1981), and 28 (1982).

The Bimillenary celebrations have given rise to a relentless stream of commentary, criticism, exposition and exhibition. Several journals Gymnasium 90 (1983), Helmantica 33 (1982), Listy Filologicke (Symposium Vergilianum: 16th International Eirene Conference) 106 (1983); Omnibus 3 (1982); Würzburger Jahrbücher für die Altertumswissenschaft 8 (1982) have highlighted Vergilian material and the parade of exhibition catalogues provides a marvelous perspective of Vergiliana in public and private collections.

The present compilation is indebted to the assistance and cooperation of Mills Memorial Library of McMaster University, to the Robarts Library of the University of Toronto, to the library of the Institute of Classical Studies and Hellenic and Roman Societies, and to the Library of the University of London. Offprints of articles and bibliographic notices for inclusion in the annual Vergilius review were received abundantly and scholars are once again asked to send material to the editor of Vergilian Bibliography, c/o Department of Classics, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada L8S 4M2.

- Bauza's collection of papers to mark the bimillenary signals South American enthusiasm for the poet. Cottrill's notice provides a list of exhibitions of Vergiliana in the U. K., a valuable guide for visitors. The Strasbourg exhibition catalogue features Grüninger's woodcuts that appeared during the 16th century. Pope John Paul II's oration to the members of the Latinitas Foundation (30/11/81) will appeal to Latin classes. Petro Magno's volume offers a tidy perspective of present-day scholarship on many aspects of Vergil's opera and includes a helpful bibliography (205-19). Melone forecasts the contents of the Atti of the 'Convegno mondiale' in Mantua, Rome, and Naples during 1981. Nutting's song for the Latin class was composed for the earlier Bimillennium. Oroz Reta offers details on Vergilian observances in Spain. Pasqualetti's enthusiasm is manifest in 24 alcaic stanzas. Polara provides a précis of the commemorative lectures on Vergil's Eclogues in Naples (1981). Rome's reporters interviewed M. C. J. Putnam after his commemorative lecture with startling headlines: Uno studioso americano attacca il mito del'eroe troiano. Putnam's contribution to the conference was entitled 'The Hesitation of Aeneas.' Schilling gives a global view of the poet at each stage of his development. Roberto De Simone, in an impressive format, expands on the mediaeval Vergil and the Neapolitan legends with a marvelous array of Grüninger woodcuts.

26. Šimun Sonje, 'O prijevodu Vergilijere Eneide od Đure Hidžbe,' Ziva Antika 32 (1982) 185-93.

Batter offers a French verse translation of segments of Aeneid 4. Fisher studies Vergil's Messianic Eclogue and Constantine's Oration to the Assembly of Saints (177-82), and juxtalinear translations of Vergil and Cicero (183-9). Kraggerud has published a rhythmic prose translation of Aeneid I in Norwegian. Seven volumes are forecast. Sonje's article examines a Yugoslavian translation.

Annibaldis, convinced that Catalepton 9 was a product of 39-29 B.C., argues that it was originally designed for Cornelius Gallus. Kennedy detects Gallan thematic, stylistic, and verbal influence in the Culex.

48. R. D. Williams (ed.), Virgil: The Eclogues and Georgics (London, New York 1979). Rev: Bernard Frischer, CP 78 (1983) 77-81.

Geymonat favours Bucolica over Eclogae as the original title. Lyne's introduction (xiii-xxii) to the reprint of Day Lewis' translation of the Eclogues and Georgics takes a fresh position on several questions, and provides generally useful explanatory notes (129-48). Roberts explores the arrangement of the Eclogues and argues that it 'dramatizes a journey into the protected pastoral preserve' followed by a return to the dangerous universe outside. Toderășcu studies the vine, grape, pinecone etc., in the Bucolics for their symbolic value.

65. Stephen V. Tracy, 'Sepulcrum Bianoris: Virgil, Eclogues 9, 59-61,' CPh 77 (1982) 328-30.

Roberts interprets Eclogue 1 as Vergil's redefinition of poetry as a mode of mimetic, not quasi-historical action, and states the limits of linguistic power. Mayer studies Eclogue 2 to determine Corydon's status and argues that servile status is unacceptable by reason of his property holdings and poetic decorum. Fisher settles on Aratus, who symbolized astronomy, as solution to the question posed in Ecl. 3.40. Conon and Aratus are suitable partners on Damoetas' cups. Courtney suggests that Vergil projects himself from the marriage of Antony and Octavia to the future and imagines the sequel, the birth of a son, in Eclogue 4. His reading of Buc. 4.60-61 is: 'begin, little boy, to recognize your mother with a smile (a supernatural thing to do); ten months (because you are a boy, not a girl) have brought long weariness to your mother.' Pulbrook's allegorical interpretation favours Daphnis as Octavian. Ogawa finds a principle of unity in the labor motif, a factor derived from Theocritus Idyll 7. Geymonat revives Savage's earlier thesis (1963) that Thyrsis is a reflection of the youthful Horace in Eclogue 7. Tracy's article coincides with Frederick Brenk's study of the sepulcrum Bianoris (Vergilian Bibliography, 1981-82, #26).

- Hering's discussion of Georg. 1.1-42 offers useful asides. Kettemann detects a new, less pessimistic perspective at the close of Georgics 3. Primmer is concerned with Georgics 3.40ff. and the design of the epic. Thomas attempts to recover the full significance of asilus (G. 3.147) and traces the literary history of the gadfly. His critical commentary, with a synthesis of technical and literary aspects, is masterly. Kraggerud's study of the Proteus passage sheds fresh light on its relevance. Warden's collection contains W. S. Anderson's essay on the Orpheus theme. Vergil's Aristaeus, in Anderson's view, is a young Aeneas, already compromised in a world of responsibility; Orpheus is possessed by a cosmic furor, like Dido and Turnus.

93. Gordon Williams, Technique and Ideas in the Aeneid (London, New Haven 1983).

Basson analyses the speeches of Jupiter (Aen. 1.257-96) and Anchises (Aen. 6.752-892) along with the shield description (Aen. 8.626-731) to determine Vergil's view of Roman history. Effe examines Vergil's narrative technique and stresses emotional subjectivity in the epic. Lyne dismisses 'failure' on the part of Aeneas or Vergil. Vergil never obscures the reality of war; imperialistic aggression involves violence and imperfect motivations may direct even the greatest hero. Phillips studies landscape in the epic and the Georgics and traces progression in its poetic use from the Eclogues. Pöschl's address underscores the humanism of Vergil's poetry. Scanlan provides topics and questions based primarily on Aeneid 1-6 for secondary school teachers. The questions are designed to excite discussion and serve as essay topics and material for test papers.

Williams sheds new light on the deeper sense of classical poetry by providing an analysis of Vergil's literary technique; his search for meaning offers new insights for thoughtful readers.

- Codoñer comments on Aen. 1.81-123. Phillips suggests that Dido's behaviour at Aen. 1.561 does not reflect embarrassment or undue modesty; her attitude is physically and psychologically apt. Borzsák detects oriental influence in the prodigy at Aen. 2.682ff. Cressey argues that Aen. 3.714 should be assigned to Anchises' episode and not to Aeneas' last agony (pace R. D. Williams, ad. loc.). Nenci stresses that humilemque (Aen. 3.522) denotes 'lowlying,' 'barely visible above the water surface.' Quint underscores the struggle between present and past in Aeneid 3 and examines episodes where present actions are guided by memories of the dead past and where the theme of forgetting appears with political implications for the new order of Augustus. Roti's view is that Aeneas stands 'alone' as sole leader after Anchises. Zijl, Rix, Pauw and Zeitsman unite in their comments on Aen. 3.568-87, and 655-81. Ameye analyses Aen. 4.298-9 (fama, eadem impia) and rejects the notion of Aeneas' character as impius. Bustamante treats Aen. 4.554-72. Hardie accepts deliberate ambiguity in Aen. 4.481f (and Aen. 6.796f) with a conflation of images (mythological and scientific) of Atlas. Capponi treats Aen. 5.213-217. Rose examines the simile at Aen. 5.270-81 as a foreshadowing of the loss of ships, separation from comrades, and safe arrivals in Italy. Barigazzi studies the demons (Aen. 6.273-81) in conjunction with Cicero, De Nat. Deor. 3.17.44 (18.47) and Lucretius DRN 3.59-81. Kinsey responds to D. P. Fowler (LCM 7: 5 [May 1982] 76) and excites Fowler's renewed attack on Aen. 6.392-4; Kinsey's parting shot (?) responds to Fowler again. The editor, J. Pinsent, grapples with the Gordian knot and suggests: 'You are armed and alive, so I cannot take you. I got no joy of previous cases (also armed) and they were of divine descent' (as you are not, since Aeneas' divine descent is unmentioned until 403-4). Pinsent prefers Fowler over Kinsey in the latest exchange. Wlosok studies Aeneid 6 with attention to the function of Anchises' speech (724ff). Basto argues that Aen. 7.10 should be seen in a symbolical and literal way; symbolically raduntur implies that the Odyssey-half of the epic has ended; the adventures of Odysseus-Aeneas are past and another invocation is required (Aen. 7.44-5). Blänsdorf introduces Apollonius Rhodius, Argon. 2 and 3, into a discussion of Aeneid 7. Fowler detects a possible acrostic in the long anacoluthic sentence at Aen. 7.601-4, describing the custom of opening the Gates of War. The initial letters, M A R S, are consonant with the subject-matter of the lines. Huxley draws on Aen. 3.392 and Aen. 8.84 to compose a witty quatrain. Senfter is concerned with the morning-star simile attached to Pallas (Aen. 8.589-91). Basson grapples with the order of names, the possibility of invention (and likely source) in the names, and the rationale for their appearance as allies. He translates ara (Aen. 10.655) as 'land, border, frontiers.' Saylor treats imagines in Aeneid 10 as frustrating opponents of the heroes in the four main encounters of the battle narrative. Venini understands Aen. 10.541 in the sense: superstans immolat ingentique umbra tegens. McKay traces similarities between the Aristaeus epyllion and the Camilliad by examining theme, structural details, and symmetrical arrangement in both tales. Farron responds to anti-Roman, anti-Augustan aspects of the epic (#136) and explains the abrupt ending of the epic as partly an attack on Rome and on the Augustan settlement. Elsewhere (138) she examines English and Classical villains including among the latter Sallust's Catiline, Horace's Cleopatra, and Vergil's Mezentius. Vázquez aligns the Vergilian simile at Aen. 12.710ff. with its prototype in Georg. 3.220-3. Lyne finds parallels for the blush of Lavinia (Aen. 12.64-70) which are clearly erotic, implying Lavinia's love for Turnus. An appendix lists a range of comments on Lavinia and on the simile.

Eubanks studies the importance of Achates' role as sympathetic complement to Aeneas' character. Feeney examines Aeneas' response to Dido's impassioned, eloquent speech (Aen. 4.305-30). Aeneas' hard-won self control will not permit him to answer in the same tenor. He fails to respond effectively, but whose words would be effective against her tirade? Foley's collection includes Christine G. Perkell's essay "On Creusa, Dido, and the Quality of Victory in Virgil's Aeneid.' Wlosok responds to contemporary criticism of the 'unheroic hero.'

Castagnoli provides a tidy conspectus of the Aeneas legend in Latium in association with recent archaeological discoveries. Hall's article studies Phocas' 5th century title of Vates Etruscus for Vergil. He examines the Etruscan background of Mantua, Vergil's cognomen, the Etruscan origins of the Aeneas myth, and Etruscan claims of descent from Trojan forefathers. Hall argues that Vergil constructed his Trojan-Etruscan alliance to reflect Etruscan support for Augustus, and to provide mythological precedent for an Italy where Trojans (Romans) and Etruscans work together to ensure a well-ordered society.

165. M. van den Bruwaene, 'Méditations sur les composantes de Rome,' Reflets d'Humanisme 70 (April 1982) 11-20.

Basson is concerned with Graviscae (Aen. 10.184) and the sources of malaria (endemic, a Lydian import, or contagion spread by Hannibal's troops from North Africa). Dubourdieu treats the Pratica di Mare finds since 1950. The thirteen altars, marking the federal sanctuary of Venus (?), and the Heroon of Aeneas together signalize the shift in emphasis from the legend of the Trojan arrival in Latium to the Trojan origins of Rome. Horsfall, with a tribute to A. M. Guillemin's L'Originalité de Virgile (Paris 1931) as uneven but stimulating, explores Vergil's lack of interest in technical minutiae and in complete consistency; narrative economy and pace are paramount, especially in his geographical allusions, and the poet is prepared to telescope or ignore distances in favour of the momentum of the epic. The action of Aeneid 7-12 is a major instance of compression; three or four campaigning seasons of the annalistic tradition transpire in a matter of days . . . To provide a coherent synthesis for Aeneid 6, in Horsfall's view, is misguided. Homeric, Pythagorean-Orphic and Stoic theories have an independent existence. Byrsa, Dido's citadel, derives from an Akkadian word meaning 'stronghold' according to Huss, but was confused with another Punic word suggesting 'ox-hide' (cf. Aen. 1.365-8). Noll's illustrated article treats hunting scenes from the Aeneas-Dido story on Coptic materials. Pane's picture book, a treasure-trove of color and black-and-white photographs of the Phlegraean Fields, is an attractive compendium. The special volume of Parola del Passato treats recent excavations in Latium: at Castel di Decima, Lanuvium, Lavinium, and at sites in Rome (Sant' Omobono, and Regia). Small's study of Cacus and Marsyas has a bearing on Aeneid 8. Van den Bruwaene weighs the etymologies of place names, people and goddesses in legends relating to Rome. The Albans, Aeneas and the white sow, and the Sabines are included in the review.

Basson examines the concept of peace in connection with the Golden Age in Vergil's works. Coleman argues that the gods of the Hellenized literary-religious tradition were not capable of bearing the serious burden of causation that Vergil placed upon them. Den Adel counters Fontenrose's (1978) statement that 'there was no oracle' at Delos. Vergil, and most Greek and Roman authors did believe in some prophecy there, although there are no extant records of oracular procedures and no quotable utterances. Certainly Vergil credits Delos with mantic activity (Aen. 3.92-6). Grimal's provocative article examines Epicurean traits in the Georgics. Schilling's lecture provides a global view of Vergil's work, commending his mastery of form and the serious tenor of his philosophical thought.

Allison finds resonances of Vergil's treatment of Dido, of the structure of the Aeneid, and of primary themes (furor, fides, and regnum) in Propertius 4, 7, and 8. Ball's survey of Tibullus contains material relevant to Vergil. Basto's study of Horace, Odes 1.3 emphasizes the mock-heroic, Vergilian traits of the propempticon. The parallels are evident largely in Aeneid 1-7. If sailing is accepted as a metaphor for poetic composition, Horace shares Vergil's audacia in poetry (with Prometheus, Daedalus, and Hercules). Collectively the elements combine to suggest that there was some mutual influence between the poets. Moles argues that Aen. 2.557-8 was influenced by Asinius Pollio's account of and reflections on the death of Pompey the Great. Nicoll finds recollections of the Aeneid structure in Ovid's account of Cupid, Apollo, and Daphne. Parsons treats the Gallus papyrus recovered from Qasr Ibrim. Romano detects further evidence of the encounter of Octavian with Vergil at Atella in Horace, Odes 3.4.37-40. Vergil and Horace together read the Georgics to Octavian at Atella in 29 BC. Traill adopts a new approach to the question of the relevance of Vergil to the second half of Horace, Odes 1.3. Horace progresses from the condemnation of the first mariner, through the gigantomachy, to the contemporary political scene. Vergil's departure for Greece, judging by the closing stanzas of the ode, may have been politically motivated. The poet may have been an agent for Augustus or Maecenas . . . West re-examines the Gallan fragment from Qasr Ibrim.

- Block's article, which treats the apostrophe to Nisus and Euryalus (Aen. 9.446ff.) in greatest detail, shows that Vergil, through a narrator who articulates an idiosyncratic response, sought to emphasize the distinct perspective of the audience. Cleary studies the use of captured arms. Turnus' use of a spolium as a weapon of war marks his impiety when compared to Aeneas. Spolia are properly dedicated to Mars or Romulus; sometimes they are destroyed, and on other occasions they are exhibited in homes or temples as signs of past victories. Görler's study of syntax, a theme treated in his Bimillenary Lecture at the Villa Vergiliana (July, 1982) is a thorough treatment of Vergilian style. Hinojo treats Vergil's use of the poetic adjective in the Eclogues and Georgics. Moskalaw's study is a major contribution to the study of verbal repetitions, their function and effect. The study is extremely well documented, extraordinarily useful, and informative. Nagle's treatment of Aen. 2.801-4 explores the means by which Vergil produces a strong sense of 'closure' and yet maintains forces for continuation. Rieks, in a valuable article, treats Vergilian style and language along with Homeric parallels. Smith's review and clarification of the areas of phonetic controversy is accomplished through a metrical analysis of all enclitic rhythms in the poetry of Vergil. Smith's painstaking study sheds considerable light on a troublesome question in Latin phonology, the accentuation of enclitic composites.

INTERPRETATION AND TEXT CRITICISM

225. Edward L. Harrison, 'Aeneid 9.240,' Vergilius 28 (1982) 62.

Green responds to Cressey (LCM 6: 5 [May 1981]) who interpreted Aen. 1.455 (operumque laborem) as 'the work of navvies'. Green's article advances Ausonius, Mosella, 305-7, where operumque labores is used and hardly admits Cressey's interpretation. Green suggests a variant reading for Aen. 1.455-artificumque manus interne (Mynors, inter se) operumque laborem. Interne suggests suppressed wonder; inter se, or intra se, suggests something more emotional. Harrison offers a new reading of Aen. 9.240, si fortuna permittitis usi (Mynors, uti), and translates "if, exploiting fortune, you send us through to seek Aeneas and the walls of Pallanteum . . ."

Barchiesi studies Homeric background to the deaths of Pallas and Lausus, the tears of Hercules, and the belt of Pallas; Vergil characteristically highlights deeper, psychological and humane implications. Harrison cites Homer, Iliad 5.311-453 as background to Vergil's Venus; there are echoes at the start (Ascanius-Cupid episode) and at the end (Venus' magical cure). Vaughn supports Servius' dictum that Vergil alludes not only to words and ideas but also to the structure of Theocritus' Idyll-Book. Van Sickle challenges the thesis and the argument. West provides a synoptic study of Vergil, Aen. 1.42-5 and Lucretius, DRN 6.390-5; Aen. 1.52-64 and Lucretius DRN 6.197-200; and Aen. 1.50-80 and Homer, Iliad 14.224-76.

André's article provides details on Vergilian influence in Seneca. Vidal studies Vergilian traits in Petronius and in Seneca's Letters. Rychlewska's article extricates allusions to the Eclogues in Nonius Marcellus (3rd century AD) and makes a useful contribution to textual criticism of the Bucolics.

253. Raimond Wünsche, 'Eine Bildnisherme in der Münchner Glyptotek,' Münchner Jahrbuch der Bildenden Kunst 31 (1980) 13-34.

Barchiesi assesses the anecdote in Gellius 6.20.1-3, relative to Georg. 2.255: ora iugo et vacuis Clanius non aequus Acerris. The tradition regarding the supposed correction runs parallel to anecdotes about Homer's comparable action. Gigante is concerned with the same lines, 255-6, but is more interested in the influence of the vicina Vesaevo / ora iugo on Vergil than in the poet's alleged emendation. Luigi Lehnus' article in Scripta Philologa (179-211) addresses the biographical notices attributed to M. Valerius Probus, the first century grammarian. He provides a new text of Probus' account of Vergil's life with divergences from Egnazio's 1507 Venetian edition (which located Vergil's birthplace three miles from Mantua). Naumann deals with fact and fiction in the Vergilian Lives. Sanz Ramos is concerned with Vergilian Parthenius, the traditional scripsit Aeneidem . . . sed non emendavit; and admonente Pollione scripsit Bucolicam. Vidal offers a critical analysis of the Phocas Life and provides a translation. Von Albrecht, with characteristic clarity and suggestion, deals broadly with Vergil's life and work, his sources and technique. Wünsche treats a probable portrait of Vergil in Munich's Glyptotek.

Cockle discusses a first century AD papyrus from Oxyrhynchus that appears to be a writing exercise involving Aen. 11.371-2. Lord's essay describes the contents and salient features of the Ambrosian manuscript and highlights the special qualities of Petrarch's manner of annotating the text as exemplified by several of his notes to Eclogue I. Petrarch's probing imagination, spacious memory, and love of Rome are repeatedly evident in his comments on works which were closely associated with his scholarly and poetic career.

- Abbolito's article treats Vergilian influences on Avitus' biblical epic. André detects survivals of Vergil in the works of Delacroix, Berlioz, and Sainte-Beuve, and explores Vergilian traits in Italian romanticism. Baldwin comments on Procopius of Gaza's use of Aen. 2.573 (communis Erinys) to describe the burden of taxation in his Panegyricus in Imp. Anast. 14. Certainly Vergil was a familiar author in early Byzantium. Cattareo salutes Gavin Douglas' innovative use of the heroic couplet in his Aeneid translation. Fichter argues that Ariosto, Tasso and Spenser read Vergil with the eyes of St. Augustine. All translated the implicit melancholy and uncertainty of the Vergilian vision into a sure knowledge that the triumph of their chosen dynasties was an image of the Christian apocalypse. De Teves Costa studies Vergilian influence in painted ceramic tiles of the 16th-18th century in Portugal's mansions and the University of Evora. Forte examines traces of Vergil's Aeneid in Luca Signorelli, the Florentine Apollonio di Giovanni, Raphael, Mephaeus Vegius' Thirteenth Book (1428), Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (1532), and Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata (1581). Fuhrmann traces the influence of Vergil's Georgics in the European tradition. Gransden treats W. H. Auden's jeu d'esprit, 'Secondary Epic' included in his Homage to Clio (1960). For Auden, Vergil's was 'a Muse betrayed' by political consideration. Huxley offers a puzzle based on five Vergilian verses. Kallendorf's doctoral thesis treats 14th and 15th century criticism of Vergil, primarily Cristoforo Landino's Vergil Commentary (1488) where Vergil emerges as Magister Morum. McKay examines Vergilian traits in paintings by Claude Lorrain, Nicolas Poussin, Peter Brueghel, and A. J. M. Turner. Martin records his impression of a poetic palimpsest of the Aeneid composed by Denis Gu  non. The contemporary version, which introduces analogies with the Boat People, draws on the first six books to yield three distinct episodes. The modern poem is a free adaptation with a powerful impact. Mueller is concerned with the interaction of epic and dramatic traditions in Racine's use of the Dido tragedy as a model for B  renice (230-248). Michael Murrin's study contains fourteen pages on Vergil. Nascimento's article treats Nicholas Trevet, an English Dominican at Oxford during the 13th and 14th centuries, who composed the earliest known commentary on Livy. His commentary on the Bucolics survives in two 15th century North Italian mss., one in the Laurentian Library, Florence, the other in Evora (Portugal). Pope's doctoral thesis argues that Spenser's use of national history in his heroic poem was directly modelled on Vergil's use of historical material in the Aeneid. She supplies new interpretations of the function of prophecies in Aeneid 1-6 and explores Aeneas' reasons for his liaison with Dido. Rudat is concerned with fatum, pietas, sapientia, and labor in the Aeneid as reflected in the great themes of Chaucer's work. Schuchard deals with Nahum Tate's Dido and Aeneas (1689) and includes illustrations by Franz Cleyn. Sinclair is concerned with the Aeneid as sacrum poema in Macrobius Sat. 1.24.13. The temple metaphor at Sat. 1.24.12 leads to the conclusion that the sacrum poema (= Aeneid) is not to be regarded as pagan counterpart to the Bible. Siro treats an anonymous work in the Laurentian Library, Florence, drawn from late antique or early mediaeval times. Goldsmith's doctoral thesis is concerned with a prose translation of the Aeneid by Joost van den Vondel, enhanced with 140 pen and ink drawings by Leonaert Bramer. Thill's article traces Vergilian elements in Jacob Balde's 17th century Latin and German odes (Carmina Lyrica). Wofford's doctoral thesis argues that Vergil's technique dramatizes the limitations and bleakness of the world wherein his characters act.
