VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1986–1987

In Memoriam – Raymond Victor Schoder, S.J. (1916–1987)

The present survey of Vergilian scholarship is the twenty-fifth in the VERGILIUS series. Classical World 68:1 (1974), published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my “Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographical Survey, 1964–73.” The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil (Walter Donlan, ed.), Garland Publishing, Inc. (New York & London 1978). Subsequent reviews of scholarship have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973), 20 (1974), 21 (1975), 22 (1976), 23 (1977), 24 (1978), 25 (1979), 26 (1980), 27 (1981), 28 (1982), 29 (1983), 30 (1984), 31 (1985) and 32 (1986).

This compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and cooperation of the Mills Memorial Library of McMaster University, and the Robarts Library of the University of Toronto. Offprints of articles and titles for inclusion in the annual VERGILIUS Bibliography have been generously provided by readers, and scholars are urged once again to send material and advice to the editor of “Vergilian Bibliography”, c/o Department of Classics, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada L8S 4M2.

Chouet's translation includes Daniel Bobillier's perceptive and evocative plates. Emily Frenkel's story for young readers will capture the newly awakened interest in American elementary schools. Simon Weller's illustrations are appealing. Geymonat's compilation of mainly verse translations in Italian is richly illustrated in colour and black-and-white. The translations derive from Annibal Caro (1581), Vittorio Alfieri (1806–07), Giacomo Leopardi (1817), Giovanni Pascoli (1923), Giuseppe Albini (1922) and Carlo Carena (1971). Geymonat's preface and the interwoven essays and Homeric parallels make the volume even more serviceable and exemplary. Day Lewis' translations, available in Oxford paperback since 1966, reappear now in "The World's Classics" with two expert scholars as contributors. Luciano Miori's verse translation is enhanced with 29 plates by Luigi Ratini, completed between 1925 and 1934. Ronchetti provides a translation into nimble hexameters with the Latin text. Sonkowsky's readings on two cassettes draw on Vergil's repertoire, with emphasis on the epic.

Currie provides an alternative to vestem, lapidem, vasum, and pilam in messem (=“harvest,” a mock heroic reference to the herbal contents of the mortar). O’Sullivan explains febris as an extreme form of literary frigidity with which the young Vergil (?) was charged at a public reading.

34. E. A. Schmidt, Bukolische Leidenschaft oder über antike Hirtenpoesie (Studien zur klassischen Philologie 22) (München 1985).

Boyle reassesses the major political, psychological and moral ideas of Vergil’s writings. He explores the poet’s intellectual and poetic development and advances a radically new conception of Vergil’s image of himself as a poet. Pastoral Meditation, Didactic Paradox, and Epic Vision, are Boyle’s concerns as he explores intertextuality and meaning.

Manning and Warren deal lightheartedly with Eclogue 1. Fantazzi and Querbach assess Thyrsis as meriting grudging admiration for his subtlety in matching euphonic qualities with thematic content in the alternating quatrains. The Bucolic is neither a paradigmatic model of Vergilian poetic aesthetics nor a simple pastoral divertissement. Rosen and Farrell support D.O. Ross (1975) in asserting that Gallus used Acontius and Milanion as erotic exempla in his Amores. Specific sources for the Gallan exempla can be identified in Callimachus’ poetry. The allusions are designed to honor Gallus and to call attention to his Callimachean doctrina.

44. Richard F. Thomas, "Virgil's Georgics and the Art of Reference," HSCP 90 (1986) 171–98.

Ross examines the elements of the physical world and the ideas, motifs and themes of Vergil's poetic thought. Ross presents the Georgics as a poem of the physical sciences, and of the power and ultimate failure of knowledge. The farmer manipulates the elements to create the necessary balance for growth; but in Vergil's universe, the potential for destruction inevitably results in a profound pessimism. Ross's observations, reminding us, inter alia, that Roman nature was the farm, not the wilderness, are illuminating and provocative. Spurr challenges generalizations regarding the Georgics, that they offer agricultural inaccuracies, that they concentrate on the small subsistence farm, and that they reflect present-day ruin of Italian agriculture. His plea for closer attention to the agricultural details is salutary and the article is highly recommended. Thomas offers a typology of reference for Vergil's manipulation of his models in the Treatises on Agriculture. Multiple references and conflation are the most sophisticated form of the art of allusion.

49. Roland Mayer, "A Note on a 'raccordo editoriale' of Virgil," Maia 38 (1986) 159.

Hermes Americanus is produced by Academia Latina Danburiensis, Bethel, Connecticut. Griffin's chapter assesses the bees in Georgic 4 as a counterpart to the self-serving austerity of traditional Roman values. The Orpheus epyllion shows Vergil's sympathy with individual sensibilities and emotions, with love and with art. Griffin tracks this dichotomy from the bucolics to the epic. Mayer treats the sphragis of the last Georgic as a reference to work published rather than work in prospect. The deviser of ille ego qui quondam sought to ease the transition from the Georgics to the Aeneid. The spurious lines, in Mayer's view, were designed for an Aeneid which followed hard upon the Georgics. 'Raccordo editoriale' refers to articles by La Penna, Maia 34 (1982) and SIFC 78 (1985).

Arkin detects three important topics in modern criticism of Vergil: the meaning of the Aeneid; employment of Catullus as source; and the poet's use of figurative language. Helen Bacon explores the theme of "election" not only to a mission but also to ultimate godhood. She accents the spiritual and visionary dimension as integral to the action. In her view, the fulfillment of the vision of the new golden age implies not merely fulfillment in this world but in the world of the spirit. Görler treats intrusions of the author into the narrative (Aen. 1, 712–4; 4, 65f.; 9, 446f.; 10, 501–4), and connections between separate events. Griffin's slender volume treats Rome and Arcadia, the Muse in Hobnails, and the Aeneid and the Myth of Rome. Griffin's offering, in 118 pages, is ideal for students of Vergil's work in translation. Heuzé's treatment of the human body in Vergil's writing weighs in heavily but offers good new perspectives throughout. The study appears in "Collection de l'École Française de Rome," 86. Horsfall is concerned with what determined victory in Vergilian combats. Jenkyns expresses enthusiasm for Vergil's Tiber landscape in Aeneid 8. He promises a book on the Aeneid. Lyne's Further Voices deals with the 'polyphonic' composition of the epic. Manfredi is concerned with the impact of Agrippan projects on Vergil's marine matters. Michelle and Robert Wilhelm provide background on the National Endowment for the Humanities project for forty elementary teachers who were convened at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio during the summer of 1986. The Vergilius article also examines Roberto Barni's canvas, Aeneas (Enea) which was based on the epic and was painted in 1983.

Hardie adduces further arguments for Housman's emendation of terras to stellas and provides a searching discussion of the omen. Kraggerud argues against taking mens etc. as a second subject of ferant; he also favors iustitiae as against iustitia, and tries to define the precise references in the conditional clause. Nussbaum argues for a semicolon after litora and Latio, and a new main clause after litora and after Latio. Thome provides a detailed examination of the Venus-Aeneas interview. Martyn has composed a poetic reflection on Aeneid 2. Molyneux considers the question of the continuity and consistency of the two main sections of Sinon's narrative (Aen. 2, 108–44; and 154–94). Konstan studies the tricks and deceptions which aroused Venus' smile. Murgia discusses double meanings in Dido's statements. Paschalis provides a thorough analysis of the Mercury episode. Saylor's article studies familiar and original facets of the lover in Aeneid 4. Aeneas and Dido are aligned with lovers as they would appear in an extended elegy or set of elegies by Propertius or Tibullus. The features are identified as madness (furor) of love; idleness as a result of love; loss of reputation because of the affair, and love's waste of interests and resources. Kinsey deals with alleged discrepancies in the account of Palinurus' death (Aen. 5, 833–871; 6, 337–62). Nethercut accents the element of control by Aeneas in the Phaethon context. Poliakoff shows how Vergil improves on the boxing match in Apollonius, Argonautica 2, 30–97. There are ethical overtones to the Vergilian episode, a reminder that responsible persons must work constantly to subdue the forces of anger and violence. Brenk discovers parallels between the eulogy for Marcellus and the Scipionic epitaphs. Reminiscent too of the Anthology, Vergil offers a blend of Roman and Hellenistic elements in his celebrated lament for Marcellus. Edgeworth probes the meanings of gates and thresholds in the Aeneid, both legendary and historical. The scene of Augustus at the threshold of the Temple of Palatine Apollo has conflicting associations. Kinsey examines the purpose of the decorations of Apollo's temple doors at Cumae. Paschalis treats Aeneid 6, 20–33 in conjunction with Catullus 64, 71–115. The central theme of the Daedalic panels is tragic experience; they foreshadow episodes to come when the young die prematurely and bring inconsolable grief to their parents. Paschalis also detects Vergil's transference of Delphic associations to three separate circumstances: laurel and tripod to Delos; sacred spring and exhalations to Faunus' oracle; and ecstatic prophecy to the Sibyl at Cumae. Putnam is also concerned with the Daedalic artwork at Cumae. He assesses the tale of Daedalus (which is the theme of the panels) as a typology mirrored in the ethical "artistry" practised by Aeneas following the standards set by Anchises at the close of Aeneid 6. Setaioli's article sheds light on episodes and meanings in Aeneid 6. Shackleton Bailey faults editors and interpreters for their incomplete understanding and for their conventional reading of the Marcellus eulogy. Rolfe Humphries' translation (1951) captured the essence and the design: "Poor boy,/if you should break the cruel fates, if only—You are to be Marcellus." Skulsky studies the Sibyl's experience as sexual and is concerned with the erotic nature of inspiration. Pearce argues that the preposition in should yield to it. (Aen. 8, 588). Gransden and R.D. Williams followed the mss. tradition (in); Markland, Mynors, Fordyce, and Pearce favor it. Worthington challenges Eden's suggested transposition which would provide geographical order. Worthington argues that the order is deliberately distorted to emphasize contrasts and to create dramatic effect. Dickie sheds considerable light on the pugnacious speech of Numanus Remulus. Huxley's verses reflect on the Nisus and Euryalus episode. Farron charges that Aeneas' human sacrifice (Aen. 10. 517–20; 11, 81–2) constitutes a serious attack on both Aeneas and Octavian. Kraggerud analyses the same passages and finds no acceptable basis for connecting the passages with Vergil's own time and the Peruvian sacrifice of 300 knights and senators at the altar of Divus Julius. Russi examines topographical implications of the Garganus association. Diomedes is properly to be seen as victor Gargani. Edgeworth is concerned with the two unnamed Dirae, the necessity for the duo, and the association of the Dirae with the threshold. He concludes that the Fury cannot be named, that both are utterly destructive, and that the threshold evokes Iliad 24 and so engenders an atmosphere of dread and doom. Feeny, Schork, and Springer are differently concerned with the close of the epic. Schork relates the final simile to other Vergilian contexts and so assesses the larger significance of the "rampart" associations. Springer adduces the Iliad as precedent; its final lines provide no detachable epilogue and the emphasis on the antagonist and the note of sympathy are all duplicated in Vergil's final verse which centers on the tragedy of the opponent's death in a line which was more familiar than it was shocking to "classical" sensibilities.

Basson sees Camilla as a paradigm of the sacrifices that war demands and of the apparent senselessness and futility of war. Camilla is an illustration of the paradox of inevitability and futility. Camps, inter alia, deals with the lack of coherent reality in Vergil's Aeneas and suggests that to render Aeneas a living creature of flesh and blood it is helpful to supplement Vergil's account with the life and person of Augustus who is certainly not portrayed in the hero but was very much in Vergil's mind in the creation of his hero. Suetonius, Seneca, and the Res Gestae all portray a real but enigmatic personality who gives substance to the reality of Vergil's creation. Camps offers an exemplary Presidential Address to the Virgil Society of the United Kingdom. Farron concerns himself with four passages which represent acts committed by Aeneas to avenge Pallas (10, 523–33; 554–60; 595–610; and 12, 930–52). The negative reaction of Vergil's contemporaries to Aeneas' denial of supplications and his scorn for parent-child relationships must have been stronger than ours. The acts were inhuman and a violation of values. Breen's article takes a close look at the armor and the characterization of Turnus, at his ancestry, the iconography of his armor, and Pallas' swordbelt. The heraldry and the animal ferocity embracing Turnus foreshadow his fate. Griffin's chapter (9) attempts to convey not only what the poet does in his creation and combination of characters, but what his purpose is and the importance of this aspect of the epic for the understanding of the whole. Lossau examines Anchises, a minor character, but the shadow of Aeneas, counterpart to Palinurus. Putnam argues that Aeneas' final act turns him into a Juno figure, a personification not of pietas but of Junonian anger.

Horsfall's article on the Aeneas-legend deals with Vergil's perception of the history and transmission of the Aeneas story. He explores how the development of the Aeneas-legend and the variant strands and stages within that development are reflected in the epic. Marchetti's review article treats J. Poucet, Les Origines de Rome. Traditions et histoire (Bruxelles 1985). Martin's review essay is concerned with Richard's edition of Pseudo-Aurelius Victor. Solmsen deals with problems attaching to the Aeneas-legend under the headings: Odysseus in Italy; Aeneas in Italy; Rome; and the Burning of the Ships.

Franz Bömer explores geographical and historical factors attaching to Aeneas' legendary landing, with extensive bibliography. Ovid's preference for Baiae (or Puteoli) as landing site is irrelevant. De Franciscis has collected articles by Amedeo Maiuti and others relating to the Phlegraean Fields, and the Sibyl's grotto, with 16 plates. Gigante has collected several of his own articles on “Virgilio e la Campania” (1982), “Virgilio sotto il Vesuvio” (1981), “Virgilio fra Ercolano e Pompei” (1983) and “Il Virgilio manoscritto di Napoli” (1981). Harrison details Vergil's use of the monuments of Athens in describing the Trojan cult of Athena. The Parthenon frieze is highlighted. Henry's lecture examines, inter alia, the Minerva-statues found in 1977 during the excavations at Pratica di Mare (anc. Lavinium). In her plea for recognition of topographical realities, landscapes, and remains as applicable to Vergil, she also treats the monumenta associated with Minerva in the epic. LIMC provides up-to-date notices on illustrations of Vergilian characters and references. McKay's source book includes Vergilian passages in connection with Rome, and Latium and Etruria. Rainini is concerned with Allecto's haunt in the valley of the Amsanctus. McHugh deals with allusions to the Seres in Vergil (Geo. 2, 121) and elsewhere in the literature of the Golden and Silver Ages. Trapp, in two articles, deals with the so-called Tomb of Vergil on Posillipo and other commemorative monuments near Naples or Mantua. Uliano's thesis seems strained in its non-Hellenic associations.

Breglia examines the Cumaeen oracle in conjunction with Demeter and Apollo and in association with her study of Phlegon of Tralles (2nd c.A.D.). Grimal discovers traces of Vergil's compromise between Epicurean thought and style and his own deeper spirituality. His departures from Lucretius contributed eventually to Roman Christianity and Christian mysticism. Hardie's offering explores a neglected area of Vergilian studies with considerable success. Schiebe finds Vergil's Saturn and the Golden Age less a product of antiquity than of his own originating genius.

ROME AND AUGUSTUS

152. Jean-Michael Roddaz, Marcus Agrippa (Paris 1984). Rev: Meyer Reinhold, AJP 107 (1986) 130–2.

Roddaz provides valuable information on Agrippa's engineering and monumental feats, as well as his political role. Vergil, who found little favor with Agrippa, was unquestionably impressed by the staunch companion of Augustus.

162. C. Weber, "Gallus' Grynium and Virgil's Cumae," ARCM 1 (1978) 45–76.

Brunhölzl casts doubt on the authenticity of the Gallus papyrus retrieved from Kasr Ibrim. Nicastrì responds to the challenge and favors authenticity for the much criticised verses. Buchheit is concerned with Odes I.7, III.1, III.4 and I.26. He refers to his contribution to Atti Convegno Virgiliano Mondiale I (1984) 212–26 entitled "Einflüsse Vergils auf das Dichterbewusstsein des Horaz. I. Vacui sub umbra lusimus. Campbell regards Horace's tribute as a subtle and witty compliment to Vergil's intellectual and poetic preoccupations, and to the tragic heroism which lies at the heart of the Georgics. Ellsworth deals with the three longest stories in Ovid's so-called Aeneid (Galatea/Acis/Polyphemus; Scylla/Glaucus/Circe; and Picus/Canens/Circe). He argues for their close integration into their context, structure, and time-frame. Küppers explores ties between Vergil and Silius Italicus in a masterly instance of German Rezeptionsgeschichte. Murgia refers to Aeneid 4.682–3, Anna's exclamation on Dido's destructive procedures. Putnam's new study of Horace's Odes IV refers repeatedly to Horace's use of Vergil's Aeneid. Sonderegger offers a technical reconstruction of the remigium alarum of Daedalus.

Block treats Vergilian apostrophes and compositional techniques in her study of Homer and Vergil. Guite's brief article is required reading for teachers and students intent on sensing the music of Vergil's verse. Håkanson includes repeated instances of Vergilian adverbial usages. Harrison's study of Vergil's similes breaks new ground. Reinke marshals selected instances of Vergil's alliterative effects felt in the linear repetition of one or more of several initial consonants. Timpanaro wins high praise for profound learning and deep love of the poet.

Barchiesi is particularly helpful with Homeric Influence on Aeneid 10. Catto examines labor improbus (Geo. 1, 145–6) in the context of Vergil’s poetic predecessors, primarily Lucretius. To Lucretius the human condition is characterized by physical labor and by mental labor, self-imposed; and this differentiates men from gods. Vergil adopted the Lucretian idea of labor, but dramatically changed both its cause and its results. Clausen’s Sather Lectures study Vergil’s relationship to his sources, the action of the poem, motivations of central characters, variety and effectiveness of poetic devices, similes, metaphors, and ekphraseis. Vergil’s aims and procedures, choices, emphases and emotional content are those of a Hellenistic poet. Clausen is the first scholar writing in English to show comprehensively the Alexandrian influence on the Aeneid. Feeney underscores Vergil’s departures from the Apollonian Hercules. Jacobson studies Euripides as an influence on Vergil’s narrative and aligns Aen. 1, 755–6 (the seven years after the Trojan War) with Helen (112, 775–6). Jocelyn shows the extent to which Lucretius assigned a Roman coloring to his account of the underworld in De Rerum Natura 3 and an allegorical rationalisation of the beliefs. Vergilian references abound. Thill is concerned with pre-Vergilian authors who affected the Mantuan. Thomas examines Geo. 4, 395, modelled on a sequence in Odyssey 4; Vergil has Cyrene, a modified Eidothea, describe Proteus' activities as pastor phocarum. But Vergil also recalls Callimachus' Victoria Berenices and his alignment of Phocas with Calchas, Homer's seer in Il. 1, 70, marks his departure from the Odyssean mode.

187. Angela Minicucci, "De Vergilio apud Cassiodorum," RPL 6 (1983) 223–9.

Consolino finds evidence of the Vergilian cento in the Medea of Hosidius Geta and in Ausonius and Proba. Courtney assesses Trimalchio's house as a hell-hole, with echoes of Vergil's underworld and of Plato's Protagoras. The house of Callias equates with Hades, and Socrates with Odysseus. Guerrini detects the presence of Vergil, Aen. 6, 95–6, 98–9, 151, and of the last four books of the epic in Tacitus Hist. II.4. Miller examines Tacitus, Histories I for Vergilian parallels, many from Aeneid 2, but from the entire epic also. Minicucci illustrates Cassiodorus' indebtedness to Vergil for grammatical knowledge.

Alpers treats Vergilian pastoral conventions in Marvell's "Damon the Mower" and Thomas Lodge's "The Solitary Reaper." Beckwith provides insights into Dickens' knowledge of the classics and Vergilian allusions in Bleak House. Bronzini studies popular legends about Vergil in South Italy during the 19th and 20th centuries. Campbell (#201) argues that Milton's attitude to Vergil is both imitative and competitive. Cleary and Sherwood show how Vergil and Dante shaped Conrad's symbolic journey and his ironic treatment of women. Kurtz resembles a failed Aeneas, "dead and buried near his Carthage and his Dido." Delage assesses Berlioz's La Prise de Troye and Les Troyens à Carthage as a merger of Vergil, Glück, and Shakespeare. Desmond explores Chaucer's transformations of Vergilian and Ovidian scenes. De Jong examines 20 drawings reflecting Vergilian motifs in a garden setting. Faber recalls Vergil's role in Italian fascism where imperialism was rampant. Faessler traces the Marcellus eulogy through Dante into a Mozart motet. Flansburg suggests that the classical valley setting for Simone Martini's frontispiece derives from Vergil's pastoral environment and from Vacluse. Galletti and Mulazzini examine decorated scenes from Vergil's epic in the palace courtyard. Gaylord's article finds reasons for Chaucer's preference for decasyllabic verses for the Dido legend and explores his application of Ovidian perspectives to the Vergilian base. Greene offers the first thorough study of imitatio, both in theory and practice, in a full range of Renaissance poets. Griffin offers a masterly reflection on T.S. Eliot's classicism and concentrates on Eliot's Dante as mediator between two otherwise irreconcilable worlds. Huxley studies C.S. Calverley's Latin exercises in verse and the larger issue of translation. Rubens' cartoons at Cardiff derive from epic themes; their authenticity is vexed. Javitch sheds light on Ovid's defiance of Vergil, a factor appreciated by Ariosto. The prioress' brooch, with its Vergilian inscription, highlights Chaucer's role, in Jungman's view, in medieval legend; both Christianity and magic are ingredients of his art. Kartschoke studies the guilty/not guilty response to Dido in the late Middle Ages. Krautter analyses the development and the uses of the bucolic genre in the late Middle Ages and Renaissance. Larivaille examines Pietro Aretino's Ragionamenti; Part II introduces a debate over imitation and plagiarism. Aretino parodies the love story of Aeneas and Dido as a demythologization of the present. The Mediaeval Lectures on Vergil (#243) mark a departure from the "monumental" study of Domenico Comparetti of time past. Twenty scholars contribute to the collection. Montano reminds us that Vergil was the first to propound Divine Providence as a cosmic force before the Advent of Christ. Dante clearly sensed in Vergil a striking coincidence with Christian thought with his sense of destiny and visions transcending history. Morse treats the continuity of major themes in Tolkien's Lord of the Rings and Vergil's Aeneid. Coincidences between Frodo and Aeneas, Aragorn and Aeneas, Dido and Denethor seem somewhat challenging in the space of Middle Earth. Pellegrini's volume contains articles by Maristella de Panizza Lorch, Mario A. Di Cesare, William J. Kennedy, and David G. Hale. Piepho's article studies Vergilian echoes in a seaside setting in association with religious allegory and ecclesiastical satire. Plaisant studies the influence of Vergil in paintings by Claude Lorrain. Sanderlin argues that Aeneas and Gawain both win the sympathy of readers today as anti-heroes, alike in their high seriousness, sense of mission, goodness, encounters with women, and human frailty. Schneider's study of Maffeo Vegio's Thirteenth Aeneid (1428) provides a careful edition, German translation, and apparatus criticus. Borrowings from Vergil are carefully examined in an elegant presentation. Schrader finds sources for Grendel's home in Vergil and the Vergilian tradition. Shanes studies a Turner painting, now lost, picturing "Aeneas relating his story to Dido.” He includes a photograph of the painting which was once in the Tate Gallery, London. Sluijter studies themes from the Aeneid in Northern Netherland paintings of the 17th and 18th century. The artists are not the most celebrated. Spillenger settles on concilio/Virgilio/esilio as indicative of Dante’s goal to gain entry to the beato concilio rather than be relegated to l’eterno esilio. Thill’s concern is with the influence of Horace, and more particularly Vergil, on the Neo-Latin poetry of the German Jesuit, Jacob Bilde. Veldman studies engravings of Crispijn di Pase de Oude which illustrate Vergilian works: Eclogues (5) Georgics (4), and Aeneid (15). Velz points to Vergil’s role in shaping Shakespeare’s conception of ancient Rome. Wankenne examines two studies by Pierre Courcelle which deal with pagan and Christian readers of the epic, and illustrated manuscripts of the Aeneid from the 10th to the 15th century. Wetherbee is concerned with Dante’s attempt to experience the classical influence in all its complexity.

A VERGIL CONCORDANCE

compiled by Henrietta Holm Warwick

This keyword-in-context concordance is based on the 1969 Oxford Classical Texts edition, P. Vergili Maronis Opera, edited by R.A.B. Mynors. The 83,520 words of the Eclogues, Georgics, and Aeneid are concorded together. Each word is alphabetically arranged and centered on the page, preceded and followed by approximately a line and a half of context. Thus various uses of a particular word can be compared easily. The righthand column gives the location of the word by work, book (or eclogue), and line. Neither capitalization nor punctuation affects the alphabetical sequence.

A Vergil Concordance will be useful not only to scholars in classical studies but also to medievalists seeking to identify quotations from Vergil and to high-school faculty teaching the Aeneid.
