VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1988–1989

The present survey of Vergilian Scholarship is the twenty-seventh in the VERGILIUS series. Classical World 68:1 (1974), published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my "Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographical Survey, 1964–73." The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil (Walter Donlan, ed.), Garland Publishing, Inc. (New York & London 1978). Subsequent reviews of scholarship have appeared in Vergilius 19 (1973), 20 (1974), 21 (1975), 22 (1976), 23 (1977), 24 (1978), 25 (1979), 26 (1980), 27 (1981), 28 (1982), 29 (1983), 30 (1984), 31 (1985), 32 (1986), 33 (1987), and 34 (1988).

The 1988–1989 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and cooperation of several libraries: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario; Cambridge University; and The Institute of Classical Studies, London, England. Offprints of articles, chapters and titles for inclusion in the annual VERGILIUS Bibliography have been generously provided by readers. Once again they are invited to send material and advice to the editor, Alexander G. McKay, Department of Classics, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada L8S 4M2.

The editor of the Vergilius Bibliography, with the technical assistance of Robert M. Wilhelm (Miami University, Oxford, Ohio), will produce a Quarter Century of Vergilian Bibliography (revised and enlarged) in a separate volume during 1990. G. H. Whitaker's A Bibliographical Guide to Classical Studies, 2 vols., has been announced. The volumes will contain a comprehensive subject guide, arranged chronologically in 13 subject sections, to books published between 1873 and 1980. The work will serve as a partial index to such series as Bursian, Jahresbericht über die Fortschritte der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, Lustrum, etc. Editions, commentaries, monographs, and collections, such as Festschriften or Conference Proceedings, will be listed, with descriptive notes and reprint sources. There will be a full index of authors, subjects and titles.

Verse translations by Sisson and Wells compete congenially and helpfully in studies and lecture halls. West's article tests their validity in a larger company and provides an apologetic prelude to his own forthcoming Penguin version.

Most supports the arguments against Vergilian authenticity of Culex; the forger's recapitulation of the Vergilian 'triad' is his condemnation.

Kennedy detects mutual poetic ideals of Vergil and Gallus in the amoeban poetic rivalry of Thyrsis and Corydon. The invocation of Arethusa in Ecl. 10 is symbolic of Gallus' poetry.

66. Bruce Thornton, "A Note on Vergil, Eclogue 4. 42–45," AJP 109 (1988) 226–228.

Bauzà's analysis of Ecl. 6 discovers dionysiac, orphic and Hesiodic elements, neo-Pythagorean, religious and magical strains. Huyck assumes that there is a missing source for the unexpected alnos as metamorphosed daughters of Helios (Ecl. 6, 61–63). Rutherford suggests that Vergil considers his own poetic future, his poetic principles and aims, in a tribute to Varius and Gallus in Bucolic 6. Thornton finds witty undercutting of escapist, wish-fulfilling qualities of the Golden Age in the colorful sheep.

72. Richard F. Thomas, "Prose into Poetry: Tradition and Meaning in Virgil's Georgics," HSCP 91 (1987) 229–260.

Batstone interprets readers' syntactical and lexical assumptions as an important part of their reading experience and as an essential part of the Georgics' value (G. 1, 1–5; 43–46). Thomas examines borrowed terminology and technical categories deriving from Varro's Res Rustica (G. 3), and from Theophrastus' Historia Plantarum in G. 2. "Even in translation, Vergil developed, transformed, and magnified his originals."

83. Richard F. Thomas (ed.), Virgil: Georgics. Vol. 2, Books III-IV. Cambridge 1988.

Foster argues that passages in the plague narrative (G. 3, 470-477; 509-514; 531-536) are meant to recall both Caesar (cf. B. G. 6, 28) and Octavian and their subjugation of northern tribes. Segal surveys the literary treatment of the Orpheus myth as the myth of the essence of poetry, its ability to encounter the fullest possible intensity of beauty and sorrow and to transform them into song. Vergil and Ovid claim the lion's share in ancient treatments. Segal treats the continuity of the myth in H. D. (Hilda Doolittle), Rukeyser, Rich, Ashberry, and Rainer Maria Rilke.

Harrison notes that Vergil extends the bounds of military epic by using non-epic material and by treating his war as a civil struggle with no easy jingoistic answers. Roman and heroic traditions emerge in the depiction of details of fighting. Vergil is a true Roman in his glorification of the state and its great men. Thaniel's "sea approach to the art of Vergil" treats drowned persons in the epic with sidelong glances at Greek poetic parallels. Wiltshire's study argues that Vergil developed strategies for reconciling the public and private: characters act in the public realm while maintaining self-distance, offer hospitality to strangers, perform sustained hard work (labor), and develop a new pietas that is both public and private.

Bettini examines the Juturna simile (A. 12. 473–478) and identifies the bird as a swallow (cf. Odyssey 22. 239ff) with dire connotations (cf. A. 12, 865–866; and Ovid., Meta. 14. 577–581). Cairns treats Aeneas, Dido and Turnus in the light of Vergil's contemporary Augustan political and literary ideology. The poet's relations with contemporary Roman elegy, with early Greek lyric, and with Homer are also studied and evaluated. Kingship, divine and human, geography and nationalism are treated to an acute examination. Capponi discusses the regatta, the cursus, and ornithological factors in his treatment of A. 5. Carleton examines Camilla's pastoral javelin (a Volscian verutum?). Dewar argues that Statius, Thebaid 9. 49–653 provides support for reading exilium at A. 10, 50. Dyer offers a radical interpretation of Fama: the eyes, tongues, mouths and ears belong not to the underside of Fama but to those who are prying and gossiping on earth as she flies overhead: "as many are the feathers on its body, so many are the eyes of those who watch below her, so many the ears she causes to prick up . . ." Goud and Yardley study the symbolic funeral of Aeneas, as a wax imago, replete with exuvias and ensem relictum, as signalling Dido's intention to consign the rogum to flames. Harrison tries to explain the brevity of Mezentius' introduction and explicates the epithet contemptor divum (A. 7, 468)

as conveying an emphatic but fleeting acknowledgment of the sacrilegious nature of war. Italic guilt is acknowledged briefly and left behind; pride attaches to the rest of the cavalcade. Kinsey sees no inconsistency in Vergil's making Anchises an encouraging interpreter of Celaeno's prophecy. Manning is uncertain whether the Araxes allusion is meant to evoke Augustus; certainly claims for a physical bridge over the Araxes are indefensible. Meijer catalogues 2 quadrerimes, 1 tireme and 1 Liburnian in Vergil's regatta. Moorton deals with A. 7, 45–49, and 187–191 and concludes that there are no inconsistencies in the genealogy. Murgia prefers sepulti to soluti at A. 9, 236. Paschalis tackles a neglected and important area of scholarship and offers insights that are original, generally convincing, and always provocative. Thomas offers more concrete observations on Vergil's ambivalence towards Aeneas' achievement. Vergil's depictions of the violation of trees in association with Aeneas' behavior reflect darker themes of the epic.

Fuhrer suggests that the epic text does not contain any development of personality, simply a statement on what true heroism and greatness may be. Laudizi offers a synoptic study of the Palinurus passages. Mackie's study of the characterization of Aeneas stresses the distinction between characterization by speech and by narrative and the differences between Vergil's and Homer's methods of characterization. He offers a book by book analysis of the poem with attention to Aeneas' pietas in relation to other moral qualities, especially furor and humanitas. Miller detects an ascending order in Vergil's categories of the feminine and a highly articulated, formal structure for the female characters. They are creatures of passion, longing, and destructiveness.

Andreae and Conticello provide an update of scholarly opinion on the celebrated Scylla and Charybdis marble group discovered in the cave at Sperlonga. Andreae's study of the Vatican Laocoon draws attention to Vergil's tableau. Clay examines Aeneas' experience at Carthage against a background of similar arrivals in the Odyssey, and argues that the account of the Trojan War in the temple decorations is the first "Iliad" of the Aeneid, one that projects its image into Books 6–12. Leach's study of landscape provides insights and provocative criticism of a central ingredient in Vergil's writings in a larger context. McKay's video offers a sympathetic account of the Vergilian Society of America's overseas headquarters, the one-time Villa Lorenz, now Villa Vergiliana, with a perspective of past professors-in-charge of the summer programs, and a series of sites and remains in the Vergilian Campi Phlegraei. Musical background and notes accompany the video film which is available from the Secretary-Treasurer of the Vergilian Society. Pagano offers a challenging theory that the uppermost temple on the Cumae acropolis resembles a Telesterion (cf. Temple F at Selinus); a Demeter sanctuary might derive from Euboean (and Boeotian) prototypes in the metropolis territory (Kyme, on Euboea). Pagano also suggests that the celebrated grotto of the Sibyl below the Apollo Temple on the lower terrace is in fact a military gallery and that the lower gallery, redesigned by Cocceius for military uses in the struggles against Sextus Pompey, was the true antrum in its earlier guise. Zanker's study of suggestive images in Augustan art and propaganda sheds light on symbolic implications of art works and allegory in Vergil's opera.

The late John Ferguson detects assimilated Epicureanism in the Bucolics along with a rejection of specific Epicurean doctrines. The pax Augusta made quietistic philosophy irrelevant and Vergil's move away from Epicureanism is reflected in both the Georgics and the Aeneid. However, some residual Epicureanism remains in his characterization of Aeneas. Henry's searching study of time remembered, prophecy, and the religious element in the epic is sensible and suggestive. Perkell's review of the theodicy brings new thoughts on a time-honored dilemma for the poet's audience and some fresh approaches to the Golden Age in Vergil's version. Wilhelm's illustrated article accents the role of Cybele in the epic and in Augustan cult service. The Ara Pacis relief of the "madonna-like" seated figure may include traits of Cybele in its composite nature.

Salomon traces the infamy attaching to Arruns' role in the Gallic entry into Italy and the attack on Clusium to the Roman apology for the Gallic capture of Rome. The fable was designed to denigrate both Gauls and Etruscans and so limit Rome's responsibility for the disaster they suffered. Vergil's Arruns, despicable slayer of Volscian Camilla, no doubt reflects the hostile tradition.

Curchin treats C. Asinius Gallus and his boast to Asconius that he was the Wunderkind of Vergil's Fourth Bucolic. Curchin examines testimony in North-west Spain where he figured as patron in A.D. 1. Horsfall accepts that Vergil knew Augustus' laudatio for Marcellus and detects affinities with encomium and panegyric in the Vergilian epicedion (A. 6. 847–853). The Vergilian 'version' may contain a transmuted version of the education of a young Roman prince. Horsfall's reference to Menander Rhetor (D. A. Russell & N. G. Wilson, eds) Oxford 1981, is an instructive pointer for subsequent scholarship.

Ahl's study of soundplay and wordplay finds intriguing alignment with Ferdinand de Saussure's study of the role of hypograms and anagrams as points of departure for literary composition in Vergilian and other contexts (#241). Roman Jakobson & Lawrence C. Jones, Shakespeare's Verbal Art (Mouton 1970) offer intriguing parallels in English verse. Donaldson suggests that the adjective dirae in epic always carries the same emotional charge as the proper noun, Dirae. Duclos examines nine similes in A. 7-12 in which Aeneas and Turnus are brought together in an 'almost autonomous world' of imagery, a natural world of violence and destruction ultimately mastered by the individual who will found the Roman nation. De Neubourg reviews J. Hellegouarc'h's Héxamètre et métrique verbale (Paris 1985).

Manning argues that the legendary connection of Juturna with the Dioscuri led Vergil to recall Pindar's Nemean 10 and to use it as a model for the Juturna episode, particularly for her final speech. Thomas suggests that the 'white bird' is probably a stork and that the manner of the reference suggests a literary antecedent. Willcock's comparison accents Homer's human interest and vividness of description; Vergil's counterpart evidences more structural control, logical planning, and variegation with three similes. Homeric ingenium (unconfined genius) competes with Vergilian ars; Vergil emerges as the greater craftsman.

Brooke treats Vergilian elements used to express Christian veritas. Paulinus of Nola evokes Vergil's epic as a basis for critical barbs at Aeneas, the gods and pagan morality. So aemulatio of the pagan literary tradition blends indissolubly with religious polemic. De Franciscis traces Aeneid 2, 1 in Pompeian graffiti. Reineke shows that Scaliger referred to Macrobius only as a rough model for his own comparisons. Spence's terse and lucid analysis accents the reception and transformation of Ciceronian rhetoric in Vergil's epic, Augustine's Confessions, Christian doctrine, and the lyrics of early troubadours.

Arbery tracks Lupa as Roman she-wolf, Rome as Babylonian whore and as allegorical embodiment of lust and avarice. Dante queries the discontinuity of the allegorical version when Vergil endeavors to lead Dante around the creature. Bate highlights a 12th-century metrical version of the Trojan War as reworked by Dares Phrygius. Blyth studies knights and knighthood in Douglas' Scots translation of the epic. Calder translates Wilamowitz' 1930 essay; unashamedly subjective, adequate but disconcerting, it is a welcome museum piece, amplified by Horsfall's afterword (#341). Susan Clark's article notes that von Veldeke replaces Vergil's pagan religious values with Christian values; Vergil's female characters are adapted to medieval patterns. Cormier's articles are concerned with medieval transformations of the epic. De Cesare probes Landino's view of the poet as "semi-divine" creator, partner to the commentator's creativity. Doebler's attention to Vergilian filial piety as a theme in Shakespeare's Henry VI reveals positive and negative variations, a tendency of Shakespeare's time.

Echard offers a critical analysis of Baptista of Mantua's Eclogues and their humanist theme. Erasmus called him "a Christian Virgil." Fleming notes Chaucer's contribution to the Trojan tragedy and his attitude towards women in Troilus and Criseyde. Flusser exhumes a Hebrew short story, with accompanying text, based on the medieval tradition of Vergil the sorcerer in the basket and his revenge. Ford's study of Ronsard's poem suggests that Ronsard may have seen himself as a Vergil figure working for regal patronage after the Augustan pattern. Gongora's Soledad primera offers echoes of Vergil's Hyrcanian tigers (Aeneid 4) and suggests that children suckled by wild animals inherit their foster-mothers' natures. Imholtz treats textual considerations overlooked by Freud in his extension of Dido's speech (4, 625, exoriare aliquis nostris ex ossibus ultor) and unnoticed by commentators in connection with Freud's Psychopathology of Everyday Life (chapter 2). He questions the attempt to interpret this particular analytic incident autobiographically.

Kallendorf's book-length study examines the rhetorical genre wherein virtue is praised and vice condemned as basis for critical analysis of the epic in the 14th and 15th centuries. Petrarch, Boccaccio, Coluccio Salutati, Maffeo Vegio, and Cristoforo Landino shared a common approach to the Aeneid. Kelsall provides a facsimile reprint of Trapp's 1718 edition, with critical notes and interpretation. Kennedy analyses Petrarch's and Spenser's borrowings from Vergil's Bucolics. Spenser's mode and style are underscored for their originality, free allegorical association, irony, and parody. Kosinski studies Orpheus' role and realizations: as harbinger of civilization, as archetypal artist, and as cult leader and priest. the inheritors of the Vergilian Orpheus include Moreau, Puvis de Chavannes, Redon, Delville, Seon, Rodin, Stravinsky, Balanchine, and Noguchi. Kerson detects influence of Vergil's Georgics (and other Roman agricultural writers) in Landivar's poem. Krier examines Spenser's imitations of Vergil's epic and Ovid's Metamorphoses; Spenser blends Vergilian pathos with Ovidian irony, moralizing and allegory, attuned to the Elizabethan times. Lee introduces his enthusiastic critique of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos with asides on Vergilian 'sadness at the doubtful doom of human kind' and on Hermann Broch's psychological novel (The Death of Virgil, 1945) and his study of Hugo von Hofmannsthal and His Time (1950). Lohe's volume deals with Aeneid 1-6. Carla Lord's article suggests that Raphael planned an illustrated Aeneid that is reflected in Raimondi's prints of scenes from the epic. Macedo studies Cesário Verde as bucolic poet whose poems condemn modern deviations from the natural world and look towards a futuristic "Golden Age." McLellan sees Tolstoy's War and Peace as paradigm for the solution of the problem of the family in 19th-century Russia and as derivative from Vergil's epic pietas.

Patterson examines 17th-century assessments of Vergil's Bucolics and accents distinct methods of interpretation, simpliciter and allegorice, a Servian distinction that persisted into 17th-century response to the poems and remains current in modern criticism. Patterson's article on Marot and Spenser is directed towards Vergilian traits, the impact of the Reformation on their works and their effect on Renaissance humanism. Pittock argues that Gonzalo's Dido draws directly on Boccaccio's De Claris Mulieribus and De Casibus Virorum. Rudat analyses creative allusions to the epic in Chaucer's Knight's Tale; and treats Pope's Vergilian allusions in the context of Servius and the Commentators who accented the 'polysemous' character of the epic. Parodic interpretation was Pope's response. Rudat also studies Milton's creative response to Vergil: Juno and Satan are paired as angry prosecutors and Circe and Eve are analogous temptresses.

Sanderlin examines Chaucer's purpose in rewriting the Dido and Aeneas story and suggests that he adopted a sympathetic "feministic" stance towards Dido, victimized by a dishonorable party. Seita's analysis of Pascoli's flawed Neo-Latin poem, Moretum, includes Vergil, Horace, Maecenas, and Vedius. Zanker assesses themes and motives in Augustan art and architecture that find their counterparts in Vergil's epic. Ziolkowski recalls that Wilkinson once referred to Fracastoro's 16th century poem as "the finest and most Virgilian example" of Renaissance didactic poems.
