VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1992–1993

IN MEMORIAM
JOHN PATRICK SULLIVAN

The present survey of Vergilian Scholarship is the thirty-first in the VERGILIUS Series. Classical World 68:1 (1974), published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my "Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographical Survey, 1964–73." The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, ed. Walter Donlan (New York & London: Garland, 1978). Subsequent reviews have appeared in VERGILIUS 19 (1973) to 38 (1992).

The 1992–1993 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and cooperation of several libraries: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University; Robarts Library, University of Toronto, and The Library of the American Academy in Rome. Notices, offprints and facsimiles of articles, chapters, and titles have been generously provided by readers. Scholars and authors are respectfully invited to send material and advice to the editor, Alexander G. McKay, Department of Classics, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario L8S 4M2, Canada. FAX: 1–(905)–577–6930.

42. S. P. Vander Kloet, "On the Etymology of Vaccinium L.," Rhodora 94 (1992) 371–3.

Farrell follows Conte's approach to Vergil's arte allusiva and the approach of the American New Historicists in a penetrating study of the third Bucolic. Morgen conjectures that the epic imagery in Eclogues 4 and 6 derives from Varro of Atax's Argonautica ca. 45–40 BCE. The prediction of a second Heroic Age in the fourth Bucolic is simply a catalogue of (literally!) second-hand poetic themes. Vander Kloet argues against the derivation of vaccinium (Ecl. 2.18.50; 10.39) from vacinthus and supports baccinium ("berry").

59. H. J. W. Wijsman, "Female Power in Georgics 3. 269/270," HSCP 94 (1992) 259–61.

Boldrer rejects germina and prefers gramina. Griffin traces numerical and temporal indicators as effecting a compromise with abstruse astronomical lore and folklore. Jenkyns concentrates on repeated references to the Euphrates in the Georgics and Aeneid and responds to Scodel and Thomas (AJP 105 [1984] 339). Labate reads plangunt, and deletes ingenti vento as redundant. Lambert aligns the allegory of the bees with Octavian's ideology. Thomas continues the critical trend from biography (the ex-pirate) to study of the poetic imagination in connection with the celebrated Corycian. The passage is aligned with a complex tradition of literary history, particularly Alexandrian (Philitas). He detects a transplanting and conflation of old pastoral figures of Arcadia and Parnassus and a terminal elegy in Galaesus (Aen. 7.535-9). Wijsman's intertextual study explores the relevance of proper names (Gargara and Ascanius).

Connors examines the imagery and mythical associations of the cypress tree in Aeneid 2, 4, and 7. Evans explores Vergil's use of the archetype of the ideal king but with significant alterations to suit his poetic purpose. Galinsky examines Aeneas in the light of modern concepts of masculinity, social responsibility, distrust of rhetoric in the epic and in today's society, and internal heroism and strong emotions. Gaskin argues that Vergil combines, without reconciling them, divergent commitments in Turnus. There is no uniformity of response. Responses oscillate between tragic sympathy for the Italic hero as tragic victim of Juno (cf. Hercules) and outright antipathy. Nethercut explores tonality and "metamorphoses" of Italia throughout Aeneid 1-4. Pavlock explores intertextual allusions that associate martial and erotic concerns in a complex way in Vergil's narrative involving Aeneas, Pallas, and Dido. Slavitt's composite nature, as poet, novelist and critic, and as translator of Vergil's Eclogues and Georgics enables him to accent reasons for Vergil's age-old reception. Reviewers waver between sympathetic response and rejection. Segal's address to the APA Symposium (1991), organized by Ward W. Briggs, Jr., highlights the quality of Conte's qualities as critic, his theoretical position, his concern with interaction between "epic code" and "epic norm," and with generic tensions. Thomas' imaginative article explores the symbolism of cross-roads in the epic: past, present, and future; and the dialectic of male and female (Aeneas, Venus, and Juno). Thornton examines techniques which enable Vergil to counteract the stigma attaching to Augustus' wimpish battle performance. Wharton's dissertation treats semantics and pragmatics in Aeneid 1-4. Wilhelm's contribution accents Aeneas' "home-coming" to lead his Etruscans to Augustan victory.

Harrison's essay concentrates on the introduction of Aeneas, his earliest speeches and their Homeric models, and on discordant critical reaction to what Aeneas has to say. Kraggerud rejects the calculated ambiguity notion regarding Aeneid 1.286–96 (vs. O'Hara and Austin) and identifies Caesar with Caesar Augustus. Marin argues that there was no marriage between Dido and Aeneas; his position was correct. Brugnoli argues that Augustus' laudatio for Marcellus was source for Vergil, Aeneid 6.871 and Propertius 3.18.15–16. Clark questions whether the Golden Bough really did assist Aeneas in finding and entering within the Gate of Hades. Cockburn challenges Austin (1977), Gotoff (1985), Tarrant (1982) and West (1987) with his etymological approach to the celebrated Gates. Goold's study is marked by his customary precision and insight; it should be required reading in Vergil seminars. Kraggerud (1987) weighs pacis against paci and adduces reasons in favor of the former: "imposing upon the nations the way of a peaceful life" as opposed to "setting the stamp of civilized usage upon peace." Mingay's illustrated article adduces some travelers' portrayals. Wells asks whether Vergil's account of the underworld helped to shape the Christian doctrine of Purgatory, and whether Aeneas himself does in any sense pass through a purgatorial experience. Zetzel's important article notes that Vergil's Hades aligns mystery cult with the problems of justice and morality in contemporary Rome. The Ludi Saeculares are central to the episode.

Foster, inter alia, associates oranti (Aen. 7.446) with arrogance, an element in Turnus' key quality of audacia. Starr notes that Vergil exaggerates and extends elements of the reality of game parks (vivaria) into an idyllic context which offers more than "real-life" details. Moretti favors connixa over connexa and convexa. Wiltshire approaches Vergil's treatment of war and its violence in Aeneid 10 in the context of war literature of the twentieth century. Putnam studies the Nachleben of Vergil's anaphoric laments, the portrayal of Umbro (Aen. 7.750–60), priest, magician and soldier, its sources, particularly in Homeric Nireus (Il. 2.671–5) and Vergil's harmonizing of love-song and dirge. Gagliardi studies Turnus' prayer to Zeus, a turning-point in his resistance to divine will. Timpanaro favors ense. . . ferro over the conjectured ecce . . . ferro (vs. ense ferro). Fowler's review includes Matthew Arnold's Sohrab and Rustum 840–5 in the Nachleben of Pallas' death. Mackie (1992) identifies the Dirae as Allecto, Megaera, and Tisiphone, and locates them in a wide cross-cultural context. Mackie's Antichthon article treats Turnus' gradual recognition that Jupiter's support is an illusion. His pietas is an essential factor in bringing disaster closer. Noonan explores the association of Daunus and Faunus with the Latins. Rowland argues that Aeneas' killing of Turnus is his final act of pietas; the Trojan hero acts as a surrogate for Pallas who would have been praesidium for Ascanius (Aen. 11.57f.)

Babcock treats the particular importance of the scene of Euryalus' mother and the impact of war on the women of Italy. "Vergil has counterpoised three references to Trojan women that mark the evanescence of their existence as 'Trojans' as the inevitability of their destiny emerges" (49). Davidson finds specific links between Dido and Atlas which add a further dimension to her tragedy. Buisel de Sequeiros studies Aeneid 4 and 6. Grimal provides a perceptive review of novel features of the celebrated love story. Jenkyns' popular article treats Eurydice, Dido, and Creusa. Kyriakidis' article examines the manner in which nocturnal events of Aeneid 2 and 3 influence Aeneas' character development and the degree to which he is affected by his own night-narration. Lee highlights two patterns of seven, and the loci which bear directly on them: Dido's appearance with seven mythic heroines in Hades, and Aeneas' loss of seven surrogate sons after leaving Dido. Mackie accents ancestral ties between Dido and Turnus. O'Hara examines the sacrificial scene and Dido's inaccurate "reading." Dido does not realize that her surrender to love for Aeneas will bring her to ultimate disaster and death. Vergil's deliberate ambiguity is characteristic. Oshiba traces Turnus' links with Homeric Paris, Hector, and Achilles, but highlights his Italic virtus and devotio. Sullivan (whose recent death is lamented by Vergilians and by scholars worldwide) contests the critical stance of latent misogyny in the epic. The power of Vergil's poetic genius and his human sympathy defies the straitjacket of his contemporary social and political environment. "The artist deliberately transcends the Augustan ideologue; the portrait of Dido remains one of the most impressive literary depictions of a woman that we have in ancient epic" (72). Michelle Wilhelm shows that weaving imagery and references to Minerva and her realms help to juxtapose scenes of war and domesticity throughout the epic and accent the terrible human costs of war.

Currie conceives of Vergil as a universalist whose dramaturgy allows him to incorporate past and contemporary values, religious and philosophical, Epicurean and Stoic. Moral "sickness," for Dion, is a Vergilian preoccupation, a malaise which poetry may alleviate by reliance on destiny. Negri's essay progresses from Aeneid 6.729–51, with overtones of Orphism, Pythagoreanism, Platonism, and Stoicism, to define the human and universal spirit. Potter's introduction provides splendid background to the Sibylline oracular tradition.

Batstone studies Propertian echoes of Vergil's Georgics in the Monobiblos (ca. 29–28 BCE). Labor, in the sense of "work" and "need for work" is the best response to worldly faults and failures. Fantham's survey includes Vergilian episodes and references. Frangoulidis examines Ovid, Met. 8.1–176. Pardini reflects on echoes of Ajax's sacrilegious action during the sack of Troy in Vergil, Aen. 2.403–6, Ovid, Met. 13.408–11 & Fasti 3.45ff., and Propertius, 4.1.113–18. Putnam provides the script for an intertextual dialogue involving consolatio and epicedium between Catullus and Vergil. Steinkuehler treats Vergil, Ovid, and Valerius Flaccus. Tissol raises the spectre of Ovidian parody of Vergil's epic.

Are Vergil’s half-lines intentional or unfinished, a metrical experiment or unintentional? Baldwin studies a Neronian intentional (?) hemistich as a novelty. Briggs examines the distinctive use of similes in the Fifth Aeneid. He suggests that they have a more immediate source than Homer, namely Vergil’s personal repertoire, upon which their function and tone depends. Edgecombe ranges over the tradition of ecphrasis from Homer to Iris Murdoch. Goins studies Vergil's different viewpoints on labor and its different connotations. Newman examines instances of olli subrigens and ad quae subridens. Salat's concern is with statistical methodology.

Bonfanti finds an echo of Apollonius Rhodius, 1.950–5 in Aen. 3.294–303. Brown examines "stargazers" at Aen. 1.742–6, and 3.513–17 and argues for reliance on Homer, Od. 5.271–5, and Il. 18.483–9. But Hannah counters with the argument that Aen. 3.516–7 relies solely on Od. 5.271–5, not on Il. 18.483–9. Haslam studies Geo. 1.427–35, the celebrated but curious acrostic (MA VE PU), in a larger context. Hollis is concerned with less well recognized affinities of Vergil's epic with widely varying types of Hellenistic poetry and individual Hellenistic poets, with stylistic variety in Vergil's catalogues, local history and antiquarianism, reges et proelia, and darker colouring (Aen. 12.409–19). Lloyd's engaging essay examines comic parallels cited in the Servian corpus. Tissol argues for Callimachean influence at Aen. 11.581–2 (Aetia), and 581–4 (Cydidippe). Ritook examines the Euripidean account of Palamedes.

Statius drew on Vergil, Aen. 11.343–75 for comparable scenes of dis-sidence (1.171ff., 3.92–3, 3.216 and 10.580–3). Dunn finds echoes of Vergilian meter, language, and content (Aen. 6.669–71 and Ovid, Met. 15.456–8). Gagliardi argues that Lucan's banquet scene echoes Dido's hospitality to Aeneas (1.636–41). Hardie's study of epic successors of Vergil includes Ovid, Lucan, Statius, Valerius Flaccus, and Silius Italicus. Kyriakidis argues that the Christian poetess supplied her own ideas and comments on Eve and Mary by adroit choice of lines and contexts for her cento. Kupperts traces Vergil's first Bucolic in Calpurnius Siculus, Nemesianus, and the Late Antique writers. Malsbary studies the methods of Cyprianus Gallus, Sedulius, and Marcus Victor in producing a synthesis of Judaeo-Christian scriptural lessons and Greco-Roman epic by paraphrase and more sophisticated devices. Ternes studies the world-politics of two poets who were close to emperors, Augustus and Valentinian, and canny advisers; their combination of Past and Future gave greater credibility to imperial policy and suggested a new way of life.

259. Fabio Stok, "La vita di Virgilio di Zono de'Magnalis," RCCM 33 (1991) 144–81.

Brugnoli and Stok provide a comprehensive coverage from Fontes Antiquiores (but omitting Horace and Propertius!) to testimonia of the 15th century, with a compilation of editions. Della Corte's biography of the poet is exemplary. Stok's article provides a Latin text and apparatus for the 14th century Bolognese treatise.

Abella’s study includes Homer, Vergil, and Spenser. Di Cesare argues that “Dante and Milton forged a style that raised the vernacular in its own way close to the sublimity achieved by Vergil in the epic hexameter.” Dronke examines continuities in Hermetic and Sibylline tradition through Late Antiquity, the Middle Ages and Italian Renaissance. Griffin confines his account to the legacy to Britain. Irmscher's collection includes A. Effenberg, "Spätantike illustrierte Vergilhandschriften," S. Neumeister, "Vergil und Dante," M. Erxleben, "Goethe und Vergil," J. Oehlert, "Schillers Aeneis-Ubertragung," and V. Riedel, "Vergil in der DDR-Literatur? Über Schwierigkeiten bei der Rezeption historischer Themen." Martindale provides select texts of Vergil, Ovid, Horace, and Lucan in the perspective of reception-history from their origin to today. Quint traces the tradition of epics of conquest and empire from Vergil to Camões and Tasso, and epics of defeat and republican liberty from Lucan to Ercilla and d'Aubigné. Wlosok includes estimates of the Georgics in her wide-ranging essay.

Allan scrutinizes Paradiso 19–20 regarding Vergil's everlasting exile. Cormier's article on adaptation treats Servius' commentary and Aeneid Ms scholia. Jacoff and Schnapp provide nine essays on Vergil in Dante. Rigo argues that Dante combined Vergilian imagery and Vergilian and Biblical vocabulary to describe the Underworld. Rossi examines Vergil's bee simile (Aen. 5.703–9) metamorphosed by Dante as angels among the beatified souls. Shapiro argues for polysemy in Vergil's epic and Dante's Commedia.

Andrews studies Hector's death in Troilus and Cressida. Quint studies triumphal narratives in the Aeneid and Pharsalia which resound in Renaissance works, Orlando Furioso and Camões' Lusiads. Ronsard's Franciade, according to Rigolot, combines Homeric origins with Vergilian perfection of style.

314. W. R. Johnson, "Dismal Decorations: Dryden's Machines in Aeneid 12," McKAY 433–47.

315. Donale Swanson, Joan Mulryan, "Milton's On the Morning of Christ's Nativity: The Virgilian and Biblical Matrices," MiltonQ 23 (1989) 59–66.

Swanson and Mulryan are involved with parallels between Vergil's Messianic Eclogue and Milton's usages of the Book of Revelation. Johnson's rebuttal to Dryden (1697) and Joseph Trapp (1731) vitiates their charges of narrative tricks and regrettable errors by demonstrating the essential function (and Vergilian idiosyncrasy) of Juturna and the Dira in the Twelfth Aeneid. Vergil "arranged for Turnus' death to be delayed by various means ("all machinery work," in Dryden's brusque phrase) until his poem could explode from the compressed force of its antinomies, its baroque shell, into glittering fragments, like Turnus' sword: fulva resplendent fragmina harena (12, 741)" (p. 445).

323. Anne D. Wallace, "Farming on Foot: Tracking Georgic in Clare and Wordsworth," TexStudLitLang 34 (1992) 509–40.

Acciani detects Vergil's Mezentius in Manzoni's estimate of Napoleon. Gentilcore traces the path of post-Vergilian georgic and treats American georgics and works related to this tradition.

TWENTIETH-CENTURY WRITERS

324. Julia Budenz, "Lines from 'Vision'," VERGILIUS 38 (1992) 24–5.
325. Marianthe Colakis, "An American Eurydice: V. R. Lang's Fire Exit," CML 13 (1992) 53–61.

338. Lisa St. Louis, "Laus Italiae," VERGILIUS 33 (1992) 124.

339. †George Thaniel, "Four 'Neoclassical' Poems," McKAY 489–91.

Colakis studies Lang's 1952 experimental drama. Budenz, Huxley, Mason, St. Louis, and Thaniel, have produced Latin and English verse on Vergilian themes. Geymonat assesses the Canadian contribution to Vergilian studies and scholarship. Herrera Zapien studies Borges' involvement with Vergil, Horace, and Homer. Huisman is concerned with the epic as source and explanation for Eliot's title. Lind, inter alia, counters Pound's contrary nature, not least in asserting that "Virgil is a second-rater, a Tennysonianized version of Homer." Poeschl's cautionary essay treats "vogues" and inept responses to classical literature. Rutledge studies the Eclogue Book as a revelation of the artist's life. "The arch poet, Gallus, in Vergil's rendering, is as many-faceted as a Cubist portrait by Picasso." (476). Vergil's description of art and the artist accords well with contemporary notions.

The color (and black-and-white) plates in the five volumes of Enciclopedia Virgiliana provide a useful gallery of manuscript illuminations, paintings, sculpture, and objets d'art. Freedman traces classical pastoral from antiquity to Renaissance, Baroque, and Rococo versions. Wlosok's resplendent article accents the allegorical aspect of Renaissance manuscripts.
