VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1994–1995

The present survey of Vergilian Scholarship is the thirty-third in the VERGILIUS series. Classical World 68:1 (1974), published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my "Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographical Survey, 1964–73." The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, ed. Walter Donlan (New York & London: Garland 1978). Subsequent reviews have appeared in VERGILIUS 19 (1973) to 40 (1994).

The 1994–1995 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and cooperation of several libraries: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University; The Hillman Library, University of Pittsburgh, and The Robarts Library of the University of Toronto. Notices, offprints, and facsimiles of articles, chapters, and titles have been generously provided by readers. Scholars and authors are cordially invited to send material and advice to the editor, Alexander G. McKay, Department of Classics, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario L8S 4M2, Canada. FAX: 1-905-526-9245.

Horsfall's handbook on Vergil, with outside contributors (W. R. Burnet and M. Geymonat) examines the poems and the main issues they raise, Vergil's life and poetic style, his influence on later Latin epic, and on Latin life and culture, and the MS tradition. Anton Powell's volume offers bright new insights and provocative arguments on a contemporary theme.

27. Raymond J. Starr, "Virgil's Seventh Eclogue and Its Readers: Biographical Allegory as an Interpretative Strategy in Antiquity and Late Antiquity," CP 90 (1995) 129–138.

Arnold detects in Virgil's puer the first articulated consciousness of a peculiarly Roman program of poetry. Dix suggests that the hyacinth grows in the Grynaean Grove, and that Damoetas' riddle concerns the shield of Ajax which reflects the form of the heavens. Ruiz de Elvira supports qui . . . parentes as the only acceptable reading, accepted by Juan Luis de la Cerda centuries ago. Starr's article sheds light on antique practices in the interpretation of Virgil's opera.

42. J. Soubiran, "Entendre Virgile (Géorg. IV 467–503)," Vita Latina 135 (1994) 15–23.

Horsfall read the manuscript and provided the introduction for Biotti's Georgic IV. De Grummond studies the humanizing factor in Vergil's plough. Dyson examines Vergil's diatribe against urban life as an extended ingenious double entendre referring to the themes and content of epic poetry. The Temple's Shadow alludes to Georgics 3.10–48, the future poem Vergil will construct for Augustus. Kraggerud reviews the meaning and contextual function of Georgics 1.83: inaratus is past participle of inarare, "ploughed" cultus should be understood more generally as "beautiful quality," "refined condition." Soubiran provides stylistic and metrical notes.

Goldberg treats epic in its cultural context that encouraged poets to develop and Roman society to value a Latin epic tradition. Lesueur studies the Aristaëus epyllion as an adumbration of the Aeneid. Lyne indicts the fallacy of audience limitation in approaching classical texts; his remarks on intertextuality embrace Vergil, Aen. 6.458–460, 851, and 4.704f. McKay's FIEC address highlights the storm-center of fusion or confusion in Latin studies . . . in Vergilian scholarship. Martindale (57) fires salvos at the 20th-century obsession with ambiguity in Vergil. O'Hara argues that Vergil provides an "inconsistent, indeterminate portrait" of Italy and the Italians in Aeneid 7–12, and explores contradictory aspects of the associations of the Trojan/Italian sides in the war with the Gigantomachy myth. He closes with reflections on the potential strengths and weaknesses of a critical approach that tries to interpret, rather than explain away, inconsistencies. Thomas's article expands the zodiacal arguments of Godefroid de Callatay (45).

Higgins compares the assonance and alliteration of arma with Homer’s andra in the Odyssey’s prelude. Kraggerud responds to O’Hara’s reading of Aeneid 1.286–88 in Death and the Optimistic Prophecy [Princeton 1990] 155–163. West reacts to Griffith’s review of his Penguin prose translation (Aen. 3.310–12). Miller’s searching analysis explores the subtle web of images and associations that link women, fire, and dangerous things, and associates this complex with the labyrinthine structures of patriarchal society that are meant to contain them. Primmer is concerned with Aen. 7.107–147, and the Harpies’ prophecy at Aen. 3.122–127. Vilatte observes that the shield of Aeneas is a reduced model of the universe, that it is concerned with geographical and “ecumenical” extraterrestrial space. Eigler’s sensible reading of enarrabile textum needs promulgation. Thomas studies Actium as a cosmic confrontation between order and disorder, with Apollo as symbol of harmony in the cosmos. Timpano’s volume contains earlier articles, sometimes updated.

Hexter's venturesome chapter argues that "Sidonian Dido is the one Dido that Vergil's foundation epic does not present." Mazzini provides a case history of Dido's psychological state. Miller highlights Apollo's presence in the epic, Olympian, Delian and Italic, with particular attention to his role involving Arruns' appeal in his assault on Camilla, and his qualifying gesture after Ascanius's first kill in Aeneid 9. Miller's concludes that Apollo's concerns are not only prophecy, colonization and Julian destiny, but also heroic morality. Morgan argues that Cresia . . . Dictaeos are more than ornamental epithets in Dido's quest to heal herself from love's shaft: they place her in a fabled setting.

Monti's examination of Maiuri's grotto of the Sibyl at Cumae leads to a forthright conclusion: "The Vergilian evidence is consistent with, and therefore corroborates, the remaining topographical and literary evidence for the identification of the grotto with the actual oracular shrine"(30). Scarcia equates the Vergilian regia (8.654) with the casa Romuli on the Capitol, a reproduction of the Palatine hut.

Armstrong and Calder provide a translation of Mommsen's Berlin lecture, highlighting his views on the Augustan poets, particularly his strictures on Vergil.

Herbert-Brown’s second chapter deals with Augustus and offers sidelights on Vergil. Johnson reconstructs the symposium in Odes 4, 12 where the power of epic poetry and the sympotic pleasure in celebrating heroes, past and present, merge agreeably. Vergil, the foremost representative of epic poetry, is invited to join the party for that reason. Putnam reviews the epicedium and consolatio that Horace composed for Vergil on the death of the critic Quintilius Varus, and underscores echoes of Catullus 96 on Quintilia’s passing.

Callaway treats three oath-scenes in the epic, Aeneid 2.431–434; 9.283–292; 12.176–215, to provide examples of the narrative functions of oath-scenes. Evans's searching "rhetorical" "topical" review includes Aeneas, the Wolf and the Twins, Romulus, The Forum Augustum, The Sabines and Rome, Numa and Ancus Marcius.

151. P. Ruth Taylor, "Valerius' Flavian Argonautica," CQ 44 (1994) 212–235.

Ariemma compares Aeneid 4.166ff., with Ovid, Heroides 7.95ff., and Statius, Silvae 3.1.73ff; 4.2.1–2; 5.2.188ff. Davis studies the short narrative eclogue describing the contents of a painting. Intertextual links suggest that Ausonius interpreted Aeneas's catabasis as a dreamlike, maybe illusory episode in the hero's career. Stok's identifies a scholiast's notice with the Julio-Claudian Cornelius Celsus rather than later Arruntius Celsus.

Cormier (168) studies echoes of Aeneid 7.141ff in a 12th-century French romance. Lord (176) studies Boccaccio's methods in presenting the texts of the Culex and Dirae-Lydia and considers what his glosses on both texts reveal of his development as a student of classical history and literature at an early stage of his career. She is concerned with the problems Boccaccio faced in editing and commenting on these poems and how he confronted them. Lord (177) describes five 15th-century manuscripts containing the complete and continuous commentary by Benvenuto da Imola on the Eclogues. Lord (178) examines an early 14th-century commentary on the Eclogues to uncover the vicissitudes of literary criticism at the time, the development of education, the mind-set of the age, and the progress of humanistic inquiry. Rudd's lecture, "Chaucer and Virgil: Two Portraits of Dido" treats Chaucer's portraits in The House of Fame, Book 1, and The Legend of Good Women, no.3, with attention to Ovid's Heroides 7.

Burrow's chapter 2, Virgil (34–51) is insightful: ". . . it is the hesitant, enigmatic silence of Aeneas, in which Virgil strives to penetrate the character of compassion, which was to give later writers space in which to construct more complex versions of heroic emotions, and with those feelings, their own narrative forms." (50–51). Haber's monograph treats Vergil, Sidney and Marvell.
