VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 1995-1996

BY

ALEXANDER G. MCKAY

In Memoriam—Mary Elizabeth Moser (1950-1996)

THE PRESENT SURVEY OF VERGILIAN SCHOLARSHIP is the thirty-fourth in the VERGILIUS series. Classical World 68:1 (1974), published in association with The Vergilian Society, Inc., contains my "Recent Work on Vergil: A Bibliographical Survey, 1964-1973." The survey was reprinted in The Classical World Bibliography of Vergil, Walter Donlan, ed., New York & London: Garland 1978. Subsequent reviews have appeared in VERGILIUS 19 (1973) to 41 (1995).

The 1995-1996 compilation is greatly indebted to the assistance and cooperation of several libraries: Mills Memorial Library, McMaster University, The Robarts Library of the University of Toronto, and the Library of Trinity University, San Antonio, TX. Notices, offprints, and facsimiles of articles, chapters, and titles have been generously provided by readers. Scholars, authors, editors and publishers are cordially invited to send material and advice to the editor, Alexander G. McKay, Department of Classics, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario L8S 4M2, Canada. FAX: 905-526-9245.

Nisbet's collected papers include The Gallus papyrus fragment, Aeneas Imperator, The Style of Virgil's Eclogues, and Georgics 4, 176-180, wherein Nisbet suggests amor... agendi to replace corrupt amor... habendi. Horsfall's Companion includes contributions by A. Perutelli (Bucolics), W. R. Barnes (Virgil: The Literary Impact), M. Geymonat (The transmission of Virgil's works in Antiquity and the Middle Ages), and W. V. Clausen (The 'Harvard School'). Peradotto's volume illustrates the applicability of modern literary theories to classical studies.

Gransden's Penguin collection ranges from the earliest translators to twentieth century exponents, with a number of pieces illustrating Vergil's influence on poets through the ages. Twentieth century poets who have imitated or responded to Vergil are: V. Sackville-West, Allen Tate, Robert Lowell, Oliver St John Gogarty, and W. H. Auden. Lacaj provides the first translation of the epic into Albanian.

Gorman examines borrowings from Vergil in the Ciris from a thematic perspective, explicating the factors that led the Ciris poet to imitate particular passages and the use to which he put these imitations to enhance the poem. Gorman argues that the poet's allusion to the Nisus and Euryalus episode (Aeneid 9,168-449) reveals verbal and thematic manipulation of that celebrated episode to enhance his own story and flaunt his learning.

Hubbard detects irony in the Catullian subtext (64 and 61) of Bucolic 4. Vergil recomposes the melody in a major key. Hubbard interprets Eclogues 1-3 as the first act in an intertextual drama of Vergil's tentative poetic self-emergence; Eclogues 4-6 are more broadly intergeneric contextual confrontations that culminate in the juxtaposition of Vergil (Menalcas) and Gallus in Eclogues 9 and 10, both masters of their separate but inter-related generic spheres. Kowara argues that Vergil used elision as a subtle method to differentiate the singers; Menalcas claims the lion's share of technical polish. Perkell senses the power of pastoral to effect response and to change values (vis-a-vis Tityrus), but Vergil leaves the conclusion open, the future actions of both characters unrevealed. "This lack of clarity, this real impossibility of an uncomplicated and definitive moral, is Vergil's hallmark" (81). Perkell's sustained reading of Eclogue 10 accents Vergil's allusion to Theocritus, Idyll 1. The allusion is ironic: Gallus differs markedly from the Daphnis model.

Dalzell's lectures provide a close analysis of Lucretius's De Rerum Natura, Vergil's Georgics, and Ovid's Ars Amatoria. His aim is to refocus critical attention on didactic poetry, to consider its purpose, history and character. Gale treats the complex, shifting world view of the Georgics, man's relationship with the world, gods, and other men. In so doing, Vergil offers a commentary on the traditional views and on the conflicting values of the poets who shaped the polyphonic tradition. The Georgics are concerned with rerum natura, man's place in the world, and with the didactic tradition itself.

Clare greatly enlarges the meaning of the Noric plague (Georgics 3). Dehon studies the diptych excursus at Georgics 3, 339-83 where Saturnia tellus confronts barbarity at the service of Augustan ideology. Dyson argues that slaughtered bullocks (Georgics and Aeneid) symbolize both pietas and impietas. Animal sacrifice frequently reminds readers of human sacrifice, a grim reality in the epic with echoes of Octavian's subjugation of Perusia during the civil wars. So verbal ambiguity creates moral ambiguity for the reader. Gros aligns Vergil's "temple" decoration with Pliny, N.H. 36, 13: the Greek sculptures associated with the Palatine Temple of Apollo, and the Amazonomachy embraced by the Temple of Apollo Sosianus were part of a revitalization of the original iconography to accord with Augustan ideology. Lee's study of the Georgics favors a Jungian approach to the ambiguities of the text, aligns Vergil with Orpheus and Aristaeus with Octavian and argues that the Georgics were the poet's gift to Augustus, an exhortation and a cautionary offering to the most powerful man in the world welcomed as salvational leader of the renewed Roman state. Penwill looks at particular characteristics of the bee community, an urbs poetica, and examines the intertextual relationships Vergil sets up with earlier texts, especially Cicero's De Re Publica, with particular reference to Octavian.

Franchi deals with aetiology and ideology in Vergil's epic. Gaskin's concern with the epic's "losers" reaches its tentative resolution at the close of his Eirene article: "The Aeneid ends, in a typically Virgilian fashion, in neither triumph nor despair, although more in despair than in triumph; but not really that either, more in what one might, at the risk of solecism, call a passionate melancholy." (96) James is occupied with the ambiguity of condere, "to found and to bury the sword" at the end thereby highlighting the cultural progenitors in a form of civil conflict. Spence recalls the symposium on 11 March, 1995 at the University of Georgia entitled "After Grief and Reason: Poets and Critics Read Vergil." The proceedings of the conference and didactic tapes are available on videotape for use in classrooms through Prof. Sarah Spence, Department of Classics, University of Georgia, Athens GA 30602 USA.

Dobbin alerts readers to a neglected note of Servius which seems to favor the Dictator over Augustus in Aeneid 1, 286-296, and argues forcefully for that identification. Dyer takes proruptum (246) as an accusative supine after mare as its direct object meaning "to cause to burst forth," and "yielding." His translation: "(Timavus) goes to make the sea surge forward and oppresses the farmed fields with the roaring salt sea." Petter asks for a naturalistic rather than an impressionistic reading of the Laocoon episode; he concludes that only the sons die and that Laocoon escapes. The sculptural group has no bearing on Vergil's episode. Clark corrects an error in Mynors's apparatus criticus which descends from Ribbeck to Geymonat, concerning the spurious completion of the hemistich at Aeneid 3, 661. Perkell argues that there is no "correct reading" of Dido's suicide, no univocal, unambiguous reading. Several "meanings" are possible, "they are a function of the poet's intention, objectively knowable and describable." Feldherr examines the boat race in Aeneid 5 as reflection of the Homeric model but recast as a contemporary circus spectacle, an image of cosmic and political order, restaging the past in a familiar and popular form of Roman civic life. Casali wonders what additional Daedalic panels Aeneas could have lingered over, perhaps scenes from the life of Daedalus, or from the careers of Theseus and Ariadne. Kilpatrick is concerned with the actual properties of horn and ivory as materials used in ancient architecture and technology, and with the natural optics of horn (transparent) and ivory (opaque): "the gate of ivory is a confirmation ...that the katabasis is a dream-vision, not literal narrative reality." (67) Molyviati-Toptsi argues that falsa insomnia is an authorial comment on the deceptive quality of Anchises' speech within the dramatic context; the speech was an invention to encourage Aeneas to fulfil his mission. Weber predicates allegoresis as a valid approach to the Aeneid based on Vergil's familiarity with Hellenistic allegorizations of Homer. Vergil not only "confronts his hero with the human passions that Lucretius saw allegorized in Tartarus", he also "adopts aspects of the Lucretian theory of the soul out of which he created his own allegory of the tree and its magical bough." (33) Lucretian imagery permeates the Vergilian allegory. Penwill highlights Vergil's allusions to philosophic myth in Aeneid 6, particularly to Plato's "Myth of Er" and to Cicero's Somnium Scipionis. The hero's departure with the Sibyl through the ivory gate implies, for Penwill, that "anyone who uses the dead as a source of moral instruction for the living, who looks to the past to find a moral paradigm for the present, who seeks ...an ethical imperative from the other side, is necessarily and inevitably deluding both himself and his fellow human beings." Dyer senses Cicero in the opening lines of Aeneid 7, and recollections of Cicero's works, his rhetoric and ideals, in the Catalogue of the Italians, the shield of Aeneas, and elsewhere. Boyd accents ekphrasis, "the most explicitly visual element of Virgil's narrative": the Juno temple murals at Carthage, the chlamys prize at the funeral games of Anchises (Aeneid 5. 250-257) and the Daedalic temple doors at Cumae (Aeneid 6. 28-33). "The interweaving of plot with image...both intensifies meaning and challenges interpretation, both demands and denies comprehension." (90) E.L. Harrison offers a detailed perspective on the curious episode, from the ramifications of Turnus's attack on the ships to the implications of Cybele's intervention at the close. Wheeler explores the implications of mutum/mussantque for suppressed voices in a particular context.

Briquel combines an Etruscan 7th century vase with the legend Laucies Mezenties (Lucius Mezentius), the "Aeneas" tumulus at Lavinium, and ancient testimony in his analysis of Vergil's construction of the contemptor deum. Hollman refers to the Ugaritic legend of the model son, Aqat, and the Etruscan Aeneas statuettes at Veii in his argument for a Punic "Aeneas". Reckford measures Venus' help, advice and encouragement, and Aeneas' frustration, against Homeric paradigms and the Hymn to Aphrodite, and explores possible implications of Venus as seductive mother for Aeneas's psychology, for Dido's tragedy, and for the Iliadic half of the epic.

Braccesi (145-191) examines the tradition of Idomeneus and the Locrian survivor of Troy in the Salento (Aeneid 3,399-401). Clark examines letters of Giles of Viterbo, humanist and cardinal, recording his Grand Tour of the Phlegraean Fields; his response to the Avernian region is colored by post-Vergilian legends and Christian associations. Zevi rehearses the impact of Euboeans on the Bay of Naples and examines the implications of the Daedalic landing at Cumae highlighted by Vergil.

Galinsky re-examines the final scene with attention to associations and relevant Homeric scenes. He proposes, evaluates, and rejects a number of possible alternative responses and adduces Philodemus's De Ira and the Epicurean view of anger to shed new light on the final episode. Vergil's audience had expectations beyond simple reliance on Peripatetic and Stoic philosophy. Miller argues that Vergil's vision of Apollo is indebted, inter alia, to Homer and Augustan ideology. The dissonance in Vergil's healing Apollo acts as a counterweight to his appearances elsewhere in the epic, and the composite vision of the god is "not unrelated to the two sides of Apollo's message to Ascanius (Aen. 9, 641-644)." (110-111) Zurawel's pedagogical exercise is concerned with moral questions and problems in Aeneid 2, 4, and 12.

Galinsky provides a unified, illustrated overview of the Augustan Age combining political and social history, art, and literature (s.v. Vergil, Aeneid: 20-24, 121-123, 238-40, 246-253) His provocative, vigorous interpretation of the creative tensions and contradictions in Augustan culture (and in Vergil) suggests that they are the basis for its vitality and influence. Konstan examines amicitia and clientship, together with candor, decency, and libertas (parrhesia) in relationships.

Ball assesses Highet's research on Vergil, especially on the Aeneid (311-315, 326). Harrison's introductory essay provides a critical survey and evaluation of scholarly work on Horace in the 20th century. Morison traces echoes of Aeneid 3, 630-633 in Ovid, Metamorphoses 14, 210-212. O'Hara notices the importance of learned etymological word play and shows that Horace's responses provide a contemporary commentary on Vergil's craft.

O'Hara's richly annotated, comprehensive collection of examples of etymological wordplay in Vergil's opera considers the historical context and analyzes the form, style and significance of the poet's wordplay. Putnam studies Vergil's description of the tamed stag as something unique, without parallel in Vergil's primary model, the Homeric epics. The artwork ekphrasis, the tale of Ganymede woven on the cloak presented as prize to Cloanthus in the boat race of Aeneid 5, 250-257, in Putnam's argument, figures as a paradigm for the epic as a whole and enables readers to reformulate major concerns of the host poem. Schork examines Aeneid 3, 522-524, 4, 345-347, 408, and 7, 122-123 for key-word (Italia) echoes.

Faber examines the immediate model for the description of the beechwood cups (Eclogues 3, 36-39), the preamble of the ekphrasis of the ivy bowl in Theocritus Idyll 1, 27-31, and a more extensive background of archaic epic descriptions and the Hellenistic imitations. Why? To enable the reader to appreciate that the phrase caelatum divini opus Alcimедontis reinforces the suggestion (Ecl. 3, 54) that the art of pastoral poetry is res ... non parva. Griffith argues that Vergil, across the space of Callimachean and Catullian texts, reappropriated the Iliadic model of the funeral of Patroclus. Horsfall revives the enigmatic Corycius senex in association with Cicero's Cato, likely a direct influence on the Georgics. La Penna assesses poetic episodes where women (or a mother) try to separate combatants. Newman's Chapter 12 treats Catullus and Vergil (393-420), [Sound Gesture, Poem 64 and the Tragic Pantomime, Catullus and Virgil as Pantomimic Artists, and Crete], Q. Caecilius Epirota (Appendix 3, 435-438), and The New Gallus as an Example of Augustan Deformation (Appendix 4, 439-443). Paschalis uncovers parallels between Vergil's Sixth Eclogue and the Lament for Bion. Petrini explores the meaning of the leading role assigned to children and heroes, most often young men, in the poems of Catullus and Vergil. Putnam studies the pervasive influence of Catullus on Vergil's text, echoes of Catullus 11 in the final phases of the epic, in the reunion of Aeneas and Anchises and elsewhere, to demonstrate the deeply subjective nature of Vergil's art.

Desnier argues that the denarius issued by M. Durmius follows the design of a series issued by Cumae during the 4th c. B.C., but replaces the mollusc with a butterfly, alluding to the death of Vergil. Maleuvre (1992) considers whether Augustus may have been involved in the execution/murder of Vergil!

Geymonat's chapter cites bibliography on the text of Vergil and of Servius (1968-1992) and suggests that there may still be real textual doubt attaching to 200-300 passages in Vergil's poems, excluding punctuation. Horsfall imagines that by the time of Probus or Gellius, the definitive author's copy of Vergil's works had long since disappeared.

326. Roxanne M. Gentilcore, "Ann Eliza Bleecker's Wilderness Pastoral: Reading Vergil in Colonial America," IJCT 1:4 (Spring 1995) 86-98.

Baldwin's skilful translation and expansive commentary provides insight into 18th century study of the classics and reveals that Johnson's wide range of subject matter incorporates borrowings from Vergil and Horace. Gentilcore studies Ann Eliza Bleecker's life and writings in the wilderness area of New York during the Revolutionary War. Bleecker's pastoral poems share some of the dichotomies and tensions peculiar to Vergil's Eclogues. Her close reading of Vergil is revealed in "On Reading Dryden's Vergil" where she compares her nocturnal flight from Indians and the death of her baby daughter to Aeneas's flight from Troy and the loss of Creusa.

340. P. Traverso, "Psicoanalisi e cultura classica: il motto virgiliano della Traumdeutung," Maia 47 (1995) 253-278.

Martindale argues, confidently, that "the presence of ancient Rome in the 20th century is not as diminished as supposed, but somewhat reconfigured". Martindale is currently editing The Cambridge Companion to Virgil. Reckford detects in the poems and plays that Eliot identified strongly with Aeneas, particularly in his scenarios involving desertion and disentanglement, and in situations where the hero is a guilt-haunted, lonely pilgrim.
