IN THEIR STUDY of the legendary sea voyage of Saint Brendan (c.484–c.577) to the Isle of the Blessed recounted in the Navigatio Sancti Brendani, Zelzer and Zelzer observe that pagan mythological elements in this and other stories share motifs with journeys to the underworld. Aeneas's golden bough is similar to a golden bough that in Slavic and Baltic legends aids the hero's approach to a mythical queen or goddess.

CARBONELL AND PENA STUDY an epigraphic poem (AE 1933, 24 = ILER 5814 = IRCP 98) containing a variant of the "Mantua me genuit" formula and examine its relation to analogous poems, all from the imperial era. This epigraphical formula would have been in circulation before it was used in Vergil's epitaph.

CAVARZERE NOTES that Horace's "sublimi feriam sidera" echoes "sublime ferent ad sidera" in Ecl. 9.29. Egelhaaf-Gaiser writes on Ovid, Her. 1. Fedeli discusses the implications of Propertius' echo, at 4.1.1–4, of Aen. 8.188, where Evander addresses Aeneas as "hospes Troiane." Gordon writes that Vergil and other Augustan poets play with the theme of magic especially in relation to the world of courtesans and brothels. At the same time, through a poetic transformation of this discourse, the poets manage to distance themselves from that world. That should not prevent us from looking at these texts once again within the larger social discourse about magic. Citations from and allusions to Ecl. 8 in the Pompeian graffiti should be contemplated within this context.

ADKIN NOTES the lexical influence of Aen. 4.663–65 on the text of the Vulgate. Ariemma's analysis of two passages of the Punica, on Paris (7.435–73) and on the restoration of the Palladium to Aeneas (13.35–82), reveals divergences from and similarities to their Vergilian models. Carderi demonstrates that Statius, Theb. 2.715–74 is modelled partly on Georg. 3.10–39. Goldlust offers an edition and translation of, and commentary on, Macrobius, Sat. 1.24, with an emphasis on the reception of Vergil's work. Holzberg argues that in Martial 9.33 the names "Flaccus" and "Maro" playfully evoke Horace and Vergil. Moscatelli shows that the battle in Valerius Flaccus' Argonautica 6.515–41 echoes Aen. 11. Nelis observes that Lucan 1.33–66 (in praise of Nero) can only properly be understood in relation to Georg. 1.25–40, 489–92, and 505–11 (in praise of Augustus). Paolucci analyzes how the debate among European humanists over the Vergilian cento Medea, later attributed to Hosidius Geta, contributes to our understanding of the circulation of the codex Salmasianus (Paris, BNF, Lat. 10318) before it reached the hands of Claude Saumaise in 1615. Prenner discusses the many Vergilian verses inserted into the Historia Augusta. Salanitro feels that the use of Homeric and Vergilian texts in the production of centones in late antiquity merits greater scholarly attention than it has received. Spentzou writes that Silius' Punica attempts to subvert the primarily Vergilian epic code. Parallels with Aeneas make it apparent that Hannibal is the dominant figure, although Scipio is Aeneas' most convincing successor.

ADORJÁNI OBSERVES that the structural similarity between the glancing light in Simonides, Fr. 543.11 PMG and the prodigy in Aen. 2-682–91, in which light shines from Ascanius’ head, makes it probable that Vergil was dependant on Simonides. Nadeau compares Ennius, Annales 175–79 to Aen. 6.179–82, following the parallel observed by Macrobius at 6.2.27.

VELAZA DEMONSTRATES that the theory that the text of the Historia Augusta is dependent on Servius’ Vergil commentary does not stand up to scrutiny. The two works are based on texts of Vergil that differ greatly from each other. Williams writes that the ninth-century manuscripts of Luxeuil demonstrate how the scriptorium integrated the new Caroline minuscule into its repertoire in ways that both maintained and expanded the house’s distinctive scribal identity from its Merovingian past. Among the manuscripts discussed is Vatican, BAV, Vat. lat. 1512 (Donatus, Interpretationes Vergilianae).

FAVREAU REPORTS that the completion of a catalogue listing the sources of medieval inscriptions allows us to define several groups: authors of classical antiquity who were considered pre-Christian, among whom Vergil ranks first; minor Christian authors of the fourth to sixth centuries; formularies and other collections; liturgical texts; and the Bible. Hardie examines the contrasting receptions of Vergil and Ovid from Chaucer through modern criticism.

HARDIE COMPARES Renaissance adaptations of the parade of heroes in Aen. 6. MacPhail explains that the sonnet sequence Les regrets by Joachim Du Bellay (c.1522–1560) contains allusions to Aeneas' descent to the underworld. When read against the background of the Neoplatonic allegorical interpretation of epic popularized by Cristoforo Landino (1424–1498), these allusions clarify both the political orientation and the unity of the Regrets.

GUASTELLA TRACES the reception of the description of Fama in Aen. 4.171–90 in art and by Christian authors through the Middle Ages and Renaissance. Suerbaum describes a 1688 etching from Nürnberg that depicts, among other figures, Vergil, speaking to a Muse who holds Homer's Iliad in her hand, and a Genius who is keeping winged Time from taking away a shield that depicts Homer on it.
