Cox and Theodorakopoulos discuss Sarah Ruden's translation of the Aeneid against the background of the rise in women's translations and adaptations of classical texts since the second half of the twentieth century. Gil examines several Latin syntactical constructions that don Enrique de Villena (1384–1434) attempted to incorporate into Castilian in his translation of the Aeneid. Lago discusses the attempt by Pier Paolo Pasolini (1922–75), Marxist poet and filmmaker, to translate the Aeneid into Italian. Reyes, Hooper, and Ross present the surviving fragments of C. S. Lewis' (1898–1963) translation of the Aeneid, saved from a bonfire, along with a Latin text, synopses, and a glossary to make the work accessible to the general reader. Suerbaum discusses Vergil's use of the word consul at Aeneid 6.819 (in reference to Brutus, the first consul) and at 7.613 (in reference to consuls in general) and the translations of these passages by the Catholic satirist and poet Thomas Murner (1475–ca. 1537). Tixi analyzes the Italian translation by Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837), writer and philologist, of Aeneid 2. Ruden uses blank verse to produce an English translation of the Aeneid in the same number of lines as the original; Pranzetti translates the Eclogues into Italian in loose hendecasyllables; and Johnston translates the Aeneid into English, using the rhythm of dactylic hexameter.

Kania reevaluates the anonymous Lament for Bion, which presents Orpheus as a mythical model for its hero, the bucolicized Bion. Kania argues that the poem reinvents its generic context by figuring all Greek poetry as equivalent or subordinate to bucolic, a gesture that advances possibilities for renewing and continuing the bucolic tradition. Vergil develops this possibility as a central theme of the Eclogues by way of references to Orpheus and singers with Orpheus-like powers. Karakasis discusses the motifs of generic self-consciousness and generic interaction in Roman pastoral.

Thomas observes that the meaning and function of Vergil’s Georgics is not easy to discern, since its ostensible function—educating rustics—cannot be taken at face value. The relationship between aesthetics and didactic function may be approached by turning to the intertextual relationship between Vergil and Lucretius: Vergil was perceived by Servius and Macrobius as having used Lucretius in a way not different in type from his use of other literary models.

Aloni comments on Aeneid 1.474–578 and 3.13–18. Felton argues that foedissima ventris ... proluviis at Aeneid 3.216–17 should be read in the context of ancient attitudes towards menstruation. Fletcher offers an explanation for why, at Aeneid 6.398, Vergil uses the epithet Amphrysia vates for the Sibyl, thus connecting the Sibyl with Apollo. Apollo’s time spent in the service of Admetus, near the Amphrysus, has a double connection with people coming back from the underworld: first, Apollo had to serve Admetus as a punishment for killing some of the Cyclopes, who make Zeus’ thunderbolts; Zeus had blasted Apollo’s son Asclepius with a thunderbolt for bringing people back from the dead. Secondly, Admetus’ wife, Alcestis, was brought back from the underworld by Hercules.

Chaudhuri notes that Cleopatra is unnamed at Aeneid 8.688: sequiturque (nefas) Aegyptia coniunx. The ancient etymology of the word nefas, from fari, confers on Cleopatra's name the sense of something that ought not to be spoken. Cleopatra's name also appears cryptically in the collocation patrio vocat at 8.696–97. Here, patrio echoes the latter part of her name, while the first part of her name derives from κλέος and is indirectly glossed by vocat. In reversing the elements of Cleopatra's name, Vergil may have drawn on a possible wordplay attributed to Homer in Il. 9, where the name of Meleager's wife, Κλεοπάτρη, can be read as the reverse of Πάτροκλος.

Prominent in the ancient criticism of Vergil, writes Powell, was the notion that Aeneas' narration in Book 2 has the nature of a rhetorical self-defense. An analysis of his narrative reveals features that have the rhetorical functions of exonerating Aeneas from blame and of presenting his actions in the best possible light. An appreciation of this rhetoric can enhance our appreciation of the subtlety of Vergil's character presentation.

One of the inscriptions discussed by Escolà Tuset—from the Christian necropolis of Torrebaja in Pueblonuevo del Guadiana (Badajoz) and dating from the last third of the fourth century or first half of the fifth—is an adaptation and imitation of a verse from Vergil. Gómez Pallarès writes that the relationship between epigraphic texts and Vergil has always been studied on the assumption that Vergil's work (mainly the Aeneid) influenced the inscriptions. But epigraphic literature written before Vergil influenced his poetry in turn. Gómez Pallarès notes that the end of the Aeneid contains specialized epigraphic vocabulary and argues that Turnus' death is presented as a mors immatura. Grandazzi's reexamination of unpublished notes from the excavations of 1956–82 on the site of Augustus' residence, as well as evidence from new excavations on the Palatine, show that Aeneid 7.170–94 realistically describes the building where the Senate met. Hui compares the leading of the defeated Carthaginians through Rome, in book 8 of Petrarch's Africa; Aeneas' tour of Arcadia, in book 8 of the Aeneid; and Caesar's visit to Troy, in Book 9 of Lucan's Pharsalia, in order to explore what they tell us about how time past and time present can coexist within a single topographic narrative. Kondratieff sees Anchises, like Aeneas, as a pattern of Augustus, as Anchises' survey of his progeny reflects Augustus' censorial activity: Augustus conducted his first census (without holding the office of censor) in 28 BC.

Adkin 2011 discusses Aeneid 7.789–91. Blandford notes that, uniquely, Vergil calls the sibyl Deiphobe. It can be argued that Vergil chose the name as the feminine equivalent of Deiphobus: Aeneid 6, 494–547 describes an encounter between Aeneas, Deiphobus, and Deiphobe; the play of names may simply be a quiet joke on Vergil's part. Feeney discusses the endings and beginnings of speeches at Aeneid 6.710–23, 9.104–6, and 10.110–16, and at Ecl. 4.46–54 and 7.1–9. Kohn remarks that Roman epic poets employ a specialized usage of the figure of parenthesis (interiectio), in which direct speech is interrupted, as for example at Aeneid 6.406–7: at ramum hunc (aperit ramum qui veste latebat) agnoscas. This figure, a product more of oratory and epic than of drama, is demonstrated by its very nature to draw attention to itself, and so to do more than simply provide narrative details.

Coffee et al. describe a digital approach to intertextual study involving the creation of a free online tool for the automatic detection of parallel phrases. A test comparison of the Aeneid and Lucan's Bellum civile shows that the tool can identify meaningful intertexts. Fratantuono notices that the battle narrative at Valerius Flaccus 6.515–41 echoes Aeneid 11. Gellérfi writes that the walk around Rome in Aeneid 8 is not the only model for Caesar's (unhistoric) visit to the ruined Troy in Lucan, but also the katabasis in Aeneid 6. Hulls writes that both Statius and Silius Italicus shaped Vergilian tradition in idiosyncratic ways, using metaphorical methods of looking back at Vergilian poetry. The basis for their reductive readings of Vergil can be found in the wider reading systems of the early imperial period, in particular those that involve Vergil as an educational text and those that involve systematized parody of Vergil. Maciver discusses the famous intertextual nexus evoked by a line in Quintus Smyrnaeus: at Quintus Smyrnaeus 14, Helen assuages Menelaus by stating that she left his home and bed unwillingly. Her words echo those of Aeneas at Aeneid 6.460; those of Medea at Apollonius Rhodius 4.1021–22; those of the coma Berenices at Catullus 66.39; and those of the coma Berenices in Callimachus, fr. 110 Pfeiffer.

McCarthy reminds us that Vergil's Aeneid and the Psalter attributed to David so influenced Augustine's writing that the Confessions have been called a recapitulation of Vergilian epic in a Christian universe and also have been described as an amplified Psalter. Classicists and theologians have studied the individual influence of these works in Augustine's Confessions, but never in relation to each other. Augustine presents the Aeneid and the Psalms as embodying incompatible forms of life. For Augustine, Vergil's epic produces a template for an imperial culture that institutionalizes a disordered drive to exalt oneself over others and to effect one's own will. The Psalms, by contrast, offer a therapeutic program to heal a disordered fixation on self and to help a person cling to God.

Power 2012 discusses the similarity of an anecdote on Tiberius' treatment of a jester—reported by both Suetonius, Tib. 57.2, and Dio 57.14.1–2—to Priam's slaughter in Aeneid 2.535–50. A unique variation in Suetonius (recipere debitum) contains a verbal and contextual similarity to Vergil's passage (praemia ... debita, Aen. 2.537–38). Power 2010 argues that Pliny, epist. 5.10, alludes to Suetonius' life of Vergil and that these allusions are part of a wider network of allusions, both within this particular letter and more generally in Pliny's Book 5, that revolve around the theme of unpublished writings. This would establish a new date for the publication of Suetonius' Illustrious Men.

Adkin demonstrates that Aeneid 2.50–53 contains an allusive etymological wordplay with Od. 8.505. Fernandelli 2012 discusses, among other topics, Ecl. 4 as a "commentary" on Catullus, and Catullan themes in Aeneid 1.441–93. Pieri examines Lucretius 4.1058–1287 and Georg. 3.209–83. Pontani examines the relationship of Aeneid 8.18–41 to Apollonius of Rhodes 3.756–60. Romani Mistretta notes that the phrase ingenti percussus amore in Georg. 2.476 alludes to Lucretius 1.922–25, mediated by Horace, Epod. 11.1–2. Scafoglio 2011 discusses the reception of Stesichorus in Vergil. Scafoglio 2012 discusses a notorious inconsistency. At Aeneid 2.554–58, Vergil seems to follow a version of the death of Priam that differs from the murder he has described at 2.547–53: Priam's headless corpse is abandoned on the Trojan shore as if he was murdered there. It can be argued that Vergil's possible allusion to the death of Pompey holds only a secondary, marginal meaning in the episode, which should be evaluated independently from historic allegory. Servius, Aeneid 2.557, invokes an unspecified tragedy by Pacuvius. In light of Vergil's imitation, Servius' comments on Aeneid 2.506 and 557 and Pacuvius, fr. 294 Schierl, can be connected with Pacuvius' Hermiona, and in particular to the messenger's speech about Neoptolemus' death, which is the divine vengeance invoked by Vergil's Priam.

Degiovanni uses evidence from Servius' commentary and from the Scholia Danielis on Aeneid 4.473, as well as from other sources, to offer suggestions on a tragedy by Pacuvius whose content would have corresponded roughly with that of Euripides' Eumenides.

Fressura 2009 discusses two bilingual Vergilian glosses. Huyck suggests placing a full stop after maesti and retaining mouebant at Aeneid 9.471; the implied subject is now the Rutulians. At 9.481–82, punctuate tune ille, senectae sera meae requies? and at 9.486 read, instead of nec te tua funera mater produxi, P. Hofman Peerlkamp's conjecture, nec fletu funera mater produxi. Kovacs and Omrani observe that the phrase molli paulatim flauescet campus arista at Ecl. 4.28 is difficult because, although the next two lines describe miraculous occurrences, the yellowing of the grain in the field is not at all miraculous. Since we need a word indicating a place unsuitable for farming, the word to be queried is campus. We might consider saltus. Scappaticcio 2012a argues that Latin papyrological studies can contribute to the philological and exegetical studies of several authors, and in particular of Vergil. Scappaticcio 2012b provides an edition and commentary on a Berlin fragment (MS Lat. qu. 709) of a Carolingian manuscript from Trier, other fragments of which are in the Staatsbibliothek in Berlin and in the Universitätsbibliothek in Gent. The ancient commentary on Aeneid 1.140–54 and 1.402–17 in this Vergilian manuscript is sometimes dependent on Servius but in other places unique.

Buckley argues that Marlowe’s play responds to an Ovidian tradition in which Aeneas betrays not only Dido, but also Troy. Responding to Lydgate’s medieval Troy Book, Marlowe inserts an imposter Aeneas into his play. Lovatt discusses the poem Carlias, by the Florentine Ugolino Verino (1438–1516), a fifteen-book epic written in Latin hexameters about the exploits of Charlemagne. Verino claims to be following in the footsteps of Homer, Vergil, and Dante. Strobl offers observations concerning the Aeneid commentary by Domizio Calderini (1444/46–1478).

For pragmatic reasons, I do not often cite in this bibliography works that do not focus on Vergil as a major topic. This is especially true in Dante studies, where it is almost impossible to avoid mentioning Vergil. Thus I have not previously cited Wetherbee's 2009 book. Galligan's 2013 review (185) has persuaded me that it ought to be included for its insightful reading not only of Vergil but of Lucan, of Lucan's reading of Vergil, and of Dante's reading of both. She writes: "Virgil is the first to be examined, and he remains sharply in focus throughout the book, as the discussion of each of the other poets [Statius and Lucan] rests to a large extent on their readings of Virgil. ... Wetherbee suggests that, as an act of poetry, Lucan read Virgil much as Dante does, but that Lucan offers Dante what Virgil cannot: anger, horror, and the grotesque. He provides a nuanced reading of Dante's reading of Lucan, arguing for Dante's awareness of both the Roman poet's irony, and his mockery of epic machinery."

Talbot demonstrates that reading the poems—until lately ignored—of the Vergilian scholar James Henry (1798–1876) against his Vergilian commentary indicates that the Vergilian presence in the poems is both more pervasive and subtle than it seems.

Bernardi Perini discusses Seamus Heaney's "Bann Valley Eclogue." McDermott writes about the influence of Hesiod and of Vergil's Georgics on Charles Frazier's novel Cold Mountain. Pogorzelski traces a systematic correspondence between the "Circe" episode of James Joyce's Ulysses and the sixth book of the Aeneid. Schiesaro suggests that Richard Heinze's familiarity with eighteenth-century authors played a fundamental role in his innovative reading of the Aeneid. Tatum contemplates the ways in which historical and political circumstances shaped the responses of many twentieth-century scholars (Viktor Pöschl, Gerda Seligson, Simone Weil, Michael Putnam, and others) to the Aeneid.

Tuck, Steven L. "Teaching Vergil's Aeneid: Integrating the Visual Evidence." Vergilius 58 (2012) 153–58.

Guastella writes about the way in which Vergil's personification of Fama was transformed into the concept of Gloria, as attested by Macrobius and Boethius. The thirteenth- and fourteenth-century manuscripts of two works by Petrarch provide evidence for the iconography associated with this concept.
