VERGILIAN BIBLIOGRAPHY 2013–2014

Shirley Werner

This 2013–2014 compilation was produced under unusual circumstances. During the inaugural fall 2014 semester at Duke Kunshan University, Kunshan, Jiangsu Province, China, where I am resident, I have not had access to the print publications on which I have relied in the past and have been entirely indebted to the electronic resources of the Duke Kunshan University Library, which are linked with those of the William R. Perkins Library, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina. I have also continued to make use of the working database of l'Année philologique (Aph) during a time of dramatic change: the Centre national de la recherche scientifique (CNRS) has withdrawn from participation in Aph, and the Société internationale de bibliographie classique (SIBC), which oversees the production of Aph, has redefined the structure of the national offices. Rather than having a central office in Paris exert editorial control over offices based in Germany, Italy, Spain, and the United States, all offices now have control over their own work. While we await the establishment of a new French office at the Université de Lille 3 in January 2015, the latest publications from France and other countries for which that office is responsible are temporarily not represented in Aph. Yet the digital world that is open to us through library resources reveals many riches if one has the patience to sift through them, with the consequence that this year's Vergilian bibliography is larger than last year's. Readers are encouraged to send new material or notices to me, the Editor of the Annual Bibliography, at the following address:

The 2012 Spanish and Italian editions of Von Albrecht's work are based on his 2006 German edition (Heidelberg). Formicola (2012) is a collection of previously published articles, some revised. Hardie (2007) remarks on scholars' tendency to read Vergil and Ovid against each other and discusses the potential benefits and limitations of this kind of criticism. McGill's (2012) study of the ways in which Roman writers define the practice of plagiarism includes discussion of Macrobius's criticisms of Vergil. Mebuke (2014) analyzes intertextuality in a chain of works by Vergil (Aeneid), Dante (Divine Comedy), romantic writers, and T. S. Eliot (The Waste Land, Ash Wednesday, and Four Quartets), taking T. S. Eliot's essays on literature as the basis for analysis. Paladini (2013) reviews C. Formicola's Virgilio: Etica poetica politica (2012). Reed (2010) examines the concept of ethnic purity in the Aeneid.

Braund considers three translations of the Aeneid that foreground the sense of alienness: the Russian Eneida by Valerii Briusov (1933); a French translation by P. Klossowski (1964); and F. Ahl's English translation (2007). Fowler writes about C. S. Lewis's translation of the Aeneid. Wilson concentrates on Gavin Douglas's Eneados (1513, published 1553).

Dance examines the way in which laughter functions as a guide to reader response and as a genre marker in Horace's Satires, Vergil's Eclogues, and Ovid's Amores. Saunders argues for an ecocritical approach to Theocritus's Idylls and Vergil's Eclogues as a way of avoiding the oppositions between reality/artificiality and nature/culture in order to reassess pastoral as a critical concept for the humanities. Wesolowski examines three "intersections" of plants and desire in the pastoral literature of Theocritus, Vergil, and Longus: the locus amoenus, the adynata of Golden Age imagery, and magic performed to alleviate desire.

Milnor's article also offers an appendix, "Quotations from Virgil on Pompeian Walls." Roman argues that the poetic claim of autonomy, that is, the poet's representation of his poetry as being beyond the control of the emperor, was a recurrent topic in Vergil and in other poetry of the early empire. Strocka discusses the only extant pictorial representation of a pre-Vergilian tradition concerning the fall of Troy: a mosaic dated on stylistic grounds to the last third of the second century A.D. shows Aeneas leaving the city with his family because he interprets the death of Laocoon and his son as an unfavorable omen.

Bessone demonstrates that Vergil's description of the Sibyl in Aen. 6 serves as Ovid's model not only for his treatment of Medea in Metamorphoses 7 but also for his Medea, fr. 2, and for Her. 12. Fulkerson argues that Ovid's Apollo and Daphne episode incorporates not only epic and elegiac but also bucolic elements, alluding especially to Ecl. 10. Holzberg discusses the ways in which Ovid's oeuvre is modelled on Vergil's. Pinotti suggests that Propertius 3.18 should be read intertextually with Aen. 6. Ramírez de Verger argues that Ovid wrote "immersaque viscera" at Met. 6.664 rather than "semesaque viscera," probably alluding to Aen. 3.244 and 8.297. Simon compares Ovid's Circe with Vergil's.

De Felice examines the occurrences of twenty Latin synaesthetic adjectives in the works of Vergil, Catullus, Horace, Lucretius, and Ovid. Hardie, in Holzberg's words, "offers after a brief discussion of κλέος and φήμη in Homer and Hesiod his reading of Aen. 4.173–197 and Ov. Met. 12.39–66, considering all possible aspects of these two passages, verses on which is founded the greater part of the Fama tradition that he then goes on to analyze." Lesiak examines "syllabic homophony"—the modern term for a sound pattern in which either the same syllable (re- re-) or the same consonant followed by variable vowels (ra- re-) is repeated—in Lucretius, Vergil's Aeneid, and Ovid's Metamorphoses and argues that its use by epic poets is intentional. Scheid and Veyne propose "si cela te convient" as a French translation for proprius at Ecl. 7.31 and "approprié" as a translation at Aen. 7.331. Shelton's dissertation examines the processes of interpretation employed when an audience encounters etymological wordplay in Latin poetry, analyzing Ovid's Metamorphoses, the poems of Tibullus, and Vergil's Aeneid in the light of modern semantics and pragmatics.

Audano, "Bruto," shows how Aen. 6.823 influenced Valerius Maximus, Augustine, and later writers. Audano, "Genesi," discusses the ways in which Aen. 6.663, which recalls Georg. 1.133–34 and Lucretius 5.1448–57 and whose content and lexicon reveal Ciceronian influence, was imitated and commented upon in antiquity and late antiquity by Seneca, Silius Italicus, Servius, Macrobius, and Lactantius. Ekblom observes “that the one attestation of the phrase sortes Vergilianae and only examples of the prophetic use of Virgil are found in the ... Historia Augusta,” and argues “that the instances of prophetic verses from Virgil in the Historia Augusta cannot be regarded as proof of Vergilian divination in antiquity. Instead, it is suggested that the sortes Vergilianae are ... a complex literary game. Vergil’s verses are invoked, both with an understanding of the original context, by fashioning the verses into new narratives by reinterpretation and by alluding to other uses of the same verses in other contexts, much like in the genre of the cento.” Incardona offers a text, Italian translation, and commentary on the panegyric for the Vandal king Trasamondo (Anth. Lat. 371 SB), including an analysis of Vergilian influence. Iulietto writes that it is possible to posit a number of correspondences between the representation of Cleopatra in De bello Actiaco and Vergil’s Dido. Kersten observes that Lucan 2.596–609 alludes to Georg. 3.224–41 and Aen. 12.101–6 and 716–22, passages that question Pompey’s suitability as a traditional epic hero. The previously unnoticed acrostic “ipse nequit” in these lines supports this interpretation. Malamud shows how Hosidius Geta’s tragedy Medea, a Vergilian cento, exhibits the allusivity, word play, and interest in formal structures that characterize Latin literature from Africa. Montemayor Aceves offers a Latin text and annotated Spanish translation of Suetonius’s Life of Vergil. Papaioannou discusses the relationship between politics and the bucolic world in Vergil’s Eclogues and Aeneid and the relevance of this relationship to Lucan’s poem. Paschalis sets Petronius, Sat. 79–99, against the backdrop of the Aeneid. Pomer Monferrer observes that Christian authors, in particular Tertullian, Jerome, and Augustine, regarded Dido as a model of monogamy, in contrast to Vergil’s emphasis on her role as Aeneas’s lover. Wolff observes that when Flavian poets drew analogies between the reigns of Domitian and Augustus, the Domitianic era was found to be inferior in that poets did not have patrons like Maecenas. For Martial, Vergil’s glory could be identified with the glory of Augustus’s reign.

Gagliardi argues that the motif of Orpheus as unhappy lover, which appears in extant Latin poetry only at the end of the Georgics, was present in Gallus's elegy. Pagán compares the debate in Sallust's Bellum Catilinae between Caesar and Cato over the execution of the conspirators (51–52) and the debate at Aen. 11.336–46 between Drances and Turnus over the carnage that could be averted if Turnus would sacrifice himself.

Becker, Felbeck, and Willems’ book contains an essay on Servius’s treatment of Thales and Heraclitus. Benedetti discusses the relevance of evidence from Servius on Aen. 10.198 to interpretation of a sculptural group on the Arch of Augustus. Garbati suggests that “dii patrii” at Servius, Aen. 4.680, may refer to the Punic goddess Tinnit. Smith examines the scholia vetera to four authors—Euripides, Aeschines, Terence, and Vergil—to appreciate the vitality of ancient literary criticism and its importance for our understanding not only of the ancient literary texts but also of the academic environments in which those texts were interpreted. Tucci draws on evidence from Servius, Aen. 8.646, and several other overlooked imperial and late antique passages that attest to the transformation of the wooden Pons Sublicius into a stone structure.

In a review of Claridge and Herklotz, De Keyser writes: “The Paper Museum (‘Museo Cartaceo’) is a collection of thousands of watercolours, drawings and prints, assembled in the seventeenth century by the Roman collector Cassiano del Pozzo.” The 160 drawings cataloged in their volume are taken from five manuscripts, which include the Vatican Vergil, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Vat. lat. 3225, ca. A.D. 400; and the Roman Vergil, BAV, Vat. lat. 3867, from the late fifth or sixth century. Ottaviano, “Scholia,” compares q, a fragmentary manuscript from the mid-ninth century from the abbey of Sankt Emmeram in Regensburg, which contains scholia partly independent of Servius, with its contemporary x, Montpellier, Bibl. interuniversitaire, Section Médecine, H 253. The first Vatican Mythographer also seems to have used material deriving from the same source. Ottaviano, “Una culla scomoda,” argues that Ecl. 4.23 represents an interpolation whose origin dates back to before the third century. Scafolgio prefers Quintilian’s reading “qui non risere parentes” at Ecl. 4.62. Scappaticcio considers the text of the first line of the Aeneid as preserved on TVindol. 452.

Harrill considers the influence of female readers of the Aeneid on two medieval adaptations, the eleventh-century Encomium Emmae reginae and the twelfth-century Roman d’Enéas. The latter is tailored to a female audience, while the former is tailored for a female patron. Shumilin demonstrates that the accessus to the Aeneid by Zono de’ Magnalis (early fourteenth century) presents an unusual variant of a Greco-Roman theory concerning the relationship between fact and fiction in poetic texts. Zono viewed historia as an objective, but not necessarily true, account; rather, it is an account that exists outside of (and before) the texts produced from it. “Historia is imagined as the material that, say, Virgil had before him, prior to the start of his work on the Aeneid.” Smolak examines two twelfth-century allegorical commentaries on Martianus Capella’s De nuptiis Mercurii et Philologiae and the first six books of Vergil’s Aeneid, written for use in the cathedral schools, in order to demonstrate the unity of philosophy, which comprises both knowledge of the universe and ethics. It is not improbable that Bernardus Silvestris was the author of both commentaries.

Burrow’s book contains a chapter on Vergil. Hardie (2013) “examines generic polyphony in Renaissance Neolatin epic, with special reference to the incorporation of ... pastoral elements in the song of the shepherds in [Jacopo] Sannazaro’s De partu Virginis [1526], an adaptation of Eclogue 4 in the context of other borrowings from the Eclogues.” In 1345 Petrarch rediscovered the letters of Cicero: Eisner argues that Dante’s relationship to the past, embodied in the figure of Vergil, shaped Petrarch’s construction of his Cicero and informed Renaissance ideas of history. Morini maintains that “studying the English history of the Aeneid is essential not only for translation theorists, but also for language historians: each consecutive version records its translator’s ideas on the appropriate diction for epic poetry, and the critical reactions to each version reflect widespread opinions on how to make English as noble and dignified as Virgil’s Latin.” Roberts offers a Latin text and English translation of, and commentary on, “the Prolegomena and accompanying prefatory material of the Cologne 1642 edition of the Virgil commentary by the Spanish Jesuit scholar Juan Luis De La Cerdá” (ca. 1558–May 6, 1643), whose “status as the greatest commentator on Virgil has never been challenged.”

Nelis's book treats the Fascist regime's appropriation of Roman history and of Vergil, Horace, Caesar, and Augustus. Strobl discusses ways in which motifs derived from Horace, carm. saec. 9–12, and Aen. 6.851–53 were incorporated into the Fascist architectural complex of the Piazza della Vittoria in Bolzano. Weiner observes that the character of the Chantymen in O'Neill's play has no corresponding character in Aeschylus's Oresteia but is explicitly crafted after the mythological Charon in bk. 6 of the Aeneid. The use of this epic archetype serves to promote O'Neill's mechanism of predetermined causality.

Fotheringham and Brooker imagine ways in which two passages in the Aeneid—Dido at 4.68–75 and the stag and hounds at 7.475–95—might be represented in film. Most observes that the Rhodian Laocoon sculpture found on the Esquiline may represent the first artistic response to the Aeneid. The iconography of the sculpture is neither dependent upon earlier sculpture, nor did it affect later treatments.
