Minet bases his study on the claim that the term carmen is ambiguous because it is found at the intersection of magical and poetical vocabularies and attempts to demonstrate that Vergil both provides a representation of magic as poetry and employs a more conventional metaphor of poetry as magic. Rhodes, Kendal, and Wilson edit fifty-six selections from the writings of translators in sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century England, each presented with a contextual introduction, notes, and suggestions for further reading. Selections include "William Caxton, Eneydos [The Aeneid] (1490)" (220–24), "Gavin Douglas, Eneados [The Aeneid] (1513)" (224–33), "Richard Stanyhurst, The Aeneid (1582)" (336–43), and "Abraham Fleming, The Bucolics of Virgil (1575)" (426–30). Torlone analyzes Vergil's influence on Russian literature from the eighteenth through twentieth centuries.

Barnard explains (131): “John Dryden’s translation of The Works of Virgil [was] the first example of a major literary work by a living English writer published by subscription. ... Imposed as a folio in fours, the original publication plans called for two classes of subscribers. The first subscribers, who numbered 101 and paid five guineas apiece in two installments, were to have a fine-paper copy with a special inserted plate dedicated to each of them. ... The second subscribers, whose number was unlimited, were to pay two guineas, also in installments, and receive a small-paper copy. In addition to £200 in copy money paid in stages, Dryden was to benefit from a portion of the subscription fees and any gifts from patrons. The translation was thus poised between a publication based on patronage and a commercial venture.” Barnard contextualizes the publication by analyzing its printing history in light of the political struggle between Dryden and his publisher. Cobbold gives a prose translation of the Aeneid with illustrations and appendices. Corsalini writes about the translation of Aeneid 2 into Italian by Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837). Fo considers the difficulties facing a translator of the Aeneid and includes, in appendix (359–62), a “Tabella sulle traduzioni virgiliane (1500–1979)” by Ida Paoloni. García Jurado writes about the ideas of Jorge Luis Borges (1899–1986) concerning the protean character of literature and the phenomenon of translation. Münch discusses strategies for translating the Georgics into French. Tixi writes about Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837) as translator of Vergil. Binder and Binder’s translation updates their edition of 2008.

- Paraskeviotis, Giorgios C. "The Mythological Exemplum in Vergil's Eclogues." Hermes 142 (2014): 418–30.

Berthet writes about the significance of the juniper tree's shadow at the end of Ecl. 10 and the metrical relationship of this passage to Ecl. 7.53–54. Gagliardi studies the influence of Cornelius Gallus on some of the Eclogues. Gioseffi takes as his point of departure M. von Albrecht's Vergil: Bucolica—Georgica—Aeneis. Eine Einführung (Heidelberg: Winter, 2006).

- West, Stephanie. "Mopsus' Fair Copy (Vergil, Eclogues 5.13–5)." ZPE 175 (2010): 22–24.

Baier argues for the possibility that the fourth eclogue shows the influence of eastern models, perhaps including the Book of Isaiah or the Sibylline Oracles. Gagliardi's "Virgilio e l'extremus labor" observes that the influence of his Theocritean model on Vergil is mediated by Gallus's love elegy. Minet's article is the second part of a study of Ecl. 8, the first part of which was published with the subtitle "L'épithalame de Damon et Alphésibée" in LEC 75 (2007) : 413–32.

Caldwell's subject is the reception of the Aeneid in Anglophone literary culture from the mid-seventeenth through the mid-nineteenth centuries, with a special focus on translations, burlesques, and parodies. Kirichenko considers the works of art described in the Aeneid as visual models for the poem's organization of its own intertextual memory and argues that works of Augustan monumental art serve a similar memorial function. Thomas applies the methodologies of myth criticism and myth analysis to interpretations of the Aeneid and of Ovid's Metamorphoses.

Feldherr examines several aspects of Vergil’s description of the shield of Aeneas that highlight the “ambiguous status” of the ekphrasis “as a literary representation figuring itself as a material presence that can become part of history as well as depicting it” (281). His article would be interesting to read in conjunction with Eric Culhed’s recent analysis of the shield of Achilles, “Movement and Sound on the Shield of Achilles in Ancient Exegesis,” GRBS 54 (2014): 192–219, in which Culhed observes that Julius Caesar Scaliger (1484–1558) “in his comparison between Homer and Virgil in the fifth book of his Poetice designated the shield as one of the strongest arguments for the decided superiority of Vergil over Homer. What bothered Scaliger were mainly the exuberant effects of movement and sound in the Homeric passage” (192).

Elliot's "Aeneas" is a poem. Rodman writes about Juno's role in the Aeneid in relation to both Freudian and Lacanian concepts of the symptom. Seo's book examines the philosophical and rhetorical concepts that underlie characterization as a literary technique in Roman epic and tragedy. Her discussion includes the Aeneid, Lucan's Bellum civile, Statius's Thebaid, and Seneca's Oedipus and Phaedra.

Miller examines the hymn sung by the Salian priests at Aen. 8.285–305 with attention to its hymnic structure, intertextuality, and within the larger contexts of the epic narrative, Roman religion, and Augustan culture.

Gagliardi argues in “Propemptikòn” that Ecl. 10.46–49 should be understood as witness to Gallus’s final poetic words. Gardner discusses the cattle plague in Georg. 3 as a metaphor for civil discord and compares it to Ovid’s account of plague in Met. 7.490–660. Hardie observes that the figure of Scylla in Ovid’s Metamorphoses derives especially from Ecl. 1.404–9 and Aen. 3.424–28. Jaeger observes that Horace’s Satires make little reference to cheese and milk because they are symbols of the pastoral world, while “Vergil’s Georgics and Eclogues claim cheese for the country, yet make it a link via commerce to the city. Varro’s De re rustica places cheese on the margins: its proper place now is away from Rome; and the right time for it at Rome was before the city’s foundation” (63). Stachon observes that Propertius 1.8a, where the poet imagines Cynthia in the frozen north, not only uses a motif from Gallus to which Vergil alludes in Ecl. 10.46–49 but also gestures explicitly, and polemically, towards Vergil in using the unusual term Vergiliae for the Pleiades. Tronchet argues that Ovid’s characterization of Anna at Fasti 3.545–656 is shaped not only by the intertextual influence of Anna in the Aeneid but also by the cult of Anna Perenna. The result is a character who serves, strangely, as an elegiac double of Aeneas.

- Weber, Clifford. "Bureaucratese in Vergil Aeneid 8.721." Vergilius 60 (2014): 117–25.

Cairns observes that a detail from Vergil's instructions for making a plough at Georg. 1.173–74 may be understood in light of his interest in learned pseudo-etymologies: in his use of the word fagus (beech) he is aware of Greek φηγός (oak), and the wood recommended here may well be the oak. Vergil may have drawn on scholia to Hesiod. Dinter takes the theoretical approach of intermediality to provide a framework for exploring the blurring of inscriptional and narrative modes in Latin poetry. He focuses on instances in the Aeneid of the expression tu/te quoque (translated from the Greek epigraphic formula καὶ σὺ), which bears sepulchral connotations and foreshadows death. Minchin compares Homer's approach to storytelling in the Iliad with Vergil's in the Aeneid, observing that the latter was a written poem presented first to a listening audience and subsequently to an audience of readers. Molero Alcaraz studies the uses of the noun fama in the works of Vergil when it is used in the sense of what is said collectively about someone or something. Short defines the word sermo in imagistic terms in order to explain its polysemy between monologic and dialogic interpretations and also its association with Mercury, arguing, with evidence from the Aeneid, that the symbolic sameness of sermo and Mercury underlies a systematic slippage of meaning between these signs. Weber writes that the sense in which recognoscere is used in Aen. 8.721 is unparalleled in verse but common in prose as a technical term belonging to the specialized vocabulary of government and law. A similar analysis may be applied to recensere, used synonymously with recognoscere at 6.682.

De Gianni observes that Ambrose alludes to "dolum ridens" in Ecl. 6.24. Emberger considers Vergil as a model for Calpurnius Siculus. Galli, "Insidie palesi," considers Hosidius Geta's Medea and the Vergiliocentones minores in the Codex Salmasianus (Paris, Bibliothèque nationale, Lat. 10318). Jakobi writes about the influence of Vergil on the sixth-century epic poet Corippus. Kenens examines the text and reception of the Iudicium coci et pistoris iudice Vulcano (AL 190 Shackleton Bailey), probably composed in the fourth century, which makes parodic reference to Vergilian epic. Klaassen observes that Silius's narrative technique in his Punica was drawn from Vergil: Hannibal appears an antitype of Aeneas, while Scipio is the Roman Aeneas; other characters also assume the role of Aeneas in different ways. McGill discusses the prose passage inserted into the De ecclesia in the Codex Salmasianus and the name "Maro Iunior" claimed by the writer of the cento. O'Hogan, "Intertextual Journey," comments on the many echoes of the Aeneid, notably of passages in which Juno plays a role, in Prudentius, who presents himself, as narrator, as a double of Aeneas. Paolucci, "Per la costituzione del testo dell'Alceste," continues her discussion of the text preserved in the Codex Salmasianus from line 145. Paolucci, "Rileggendo," discusses a number of difficult passages in the cento Versus ad gratiam Domini, basing her observations on C. Arcidiacono's 2011 edition. Trinacty examines the repetition, by Lucan and Silius Italicus, of a bilingual pun found in the Aeneid. In the epilogue to his edition of selected papers on poetry and history, Woodman observes that the narratives of Latin historians exhibit a fundamentally poetic element. He takes as a methodological case study the relationship between Tacitus, Ann. 15.38–40, on the great fire in Rome under Nero, and Aen. 2, on the destruction of Troy.

Birbaumer and Zintzen focus especially on the partings of Aeneas and Dido and of Odysseus and Kalypso. Conte pays particular attention to Vergil and Homer. Dexter gives a thematic and stylistic analysis of Georg. 4.507–27 in its relationship to its model, a Hellenistic elegy by Phanocles (fr. 1 Powell). Lowe suggests that Aen. 4.386 looks back to Apollonius, Argonautica 4.386, a coincidence in line and book number that he terms stichometric allusion. Roche writes about the borrowing at Ecl. 1.53–55 of a motif from Meleager 12 Gow-Page (AP 7.195). Secci writes that the expression "pelle Libystidis ursae" at Aen. 5.37 and 8.368 alludes to Apollonius's Argonautica and serves "as a pointer to the motif of the creation of a new homeland within a foreign territory."

Clément-Tarantino discusses passages in Servius. Delvigo, “‘Mythici’ vs ‘physici,’” examines the relationship of physics and cosmology to myth in Servius’s commentary on the Aeneid, drawing comparative evidence from the writings of Augustine. Delvigo, “Servio e l’analogia,” discusses Servius, Georg. 4.219–27. Gioseffi, “Come nasce un commento?,” starts with a passage in Seneca (Dial. 10.9.2–4) as background for the analysis of the formula id est in Latin prose and in late-antique commentaries to Vergil, paying particular attention to the work of Tiberius Claudius Donatus and to the different types of notes introduced with this phrase. Lucarini offers improvements to the text of a previously missing section of the sixth book of Donatus’s Interpretationes Vergilianae as edited by P. K. Marshall, Manuscripta 37 (1993) 3–20. The text is preserved in Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Vat. lat. 8222, fols. 2r–9v. Monno observes that Servius’s remarks at Aen. 1.381 and 3.522 on the use of conscendere and the meaning of humilis imply elements of a physical theory. Pirovano, “Glosse, 2,” studies the interlinear and marginal glosses in Bern, Burgerbibliothek 165. Ramires comments on Jeunet-Mancy’s Commentaire sur l’Énéide de Virgile: Livre VI (Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 2012). Squillante Saccone discusses passages from Donatus. Stok’s “Esegesi antiche” focuses on Servius. Stok, “Triumviri agris diuidendis,” writes about the expropriation of land mentioned by Vergil in the Eclogues in the context of Servius’s claim that a commission of three (triumviri agris diuidendis)—composed of Alfenus Varus, Asinius Pollio, and Cornelius Gallus—managed these expropriations. Zanker argues that assumptions we have about expressions of meaning may mislead us into adopting an interpretation of a phrase common in Servius—“hoc vult dicere”—as if it were equivalent to “ça veut dire.” It is more likely, he writes, that Vergil is the subject of vult and that hoc serves either as a direct object or as an ablative of means.

Ammannati and Pittà discuss lacunae and transpositions in the tenth-century manuscript γ (Guelferbytanus Gudianus Lat. 2° 70), comparing it with the fifth- or sixth-century P (Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Pal. Lat. 1631). Fressura, “Problemi,” questions L. Casson and E. L. Hettich’s attribution of P.Ness. II 1 fr. 7 to Vergil, Aen. 1.618–19 and 624–25. The text is too fragmentary to allow any other identification to be made. Kraggerud, “Unfounded Consensus,” prefers the readings omnisa over omnia at Ecl. 6.34; sperent over sperant at Georg. 1.36–37; and Atriden over Atridas at Aen. 1.458. Traina suggests reading pernix at Georg. 3.230 in light of the textual tradition, semantics, and intertextual correspondences with Horace, Ep. 2.42 and Odes 3.16.26. Trappes-Lomax discusses the possibility of interpolation at Aen. 9.579.

Bretzigheimer's topic is the twelfth-century Ylias, which takes as its models the Ilias Latina, Ovid's Metamorphoses, and the Aeneid. Burnyeat responds to the modern critical assumption that Táin Bó Cúailnge (The Cattle Raid of Cooley) is the medieval Irish equivalent to the Aeneid, and to the late-antique and medieval commonplace that, in his relationship to his Homeric sources, Vergil was as much a compiler as he was an auctor. Carlson writes about the literary rivalry between John Gower (ca. 1330–1408) and Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1340–1400), observing that "Gower's rivalry with Chaucer was only part of his manifold literary antagonism, however, encompassing not only a senior poet's rivalry with a junior, but also Gower's rivalry with an ancient author, whom Chaucer too used but Gower knew better, Ovid" (932). In his conception of "vaga Fama" at Visio Anglie 1231–32, however, Gower refers to Aen. 4.173–96, "when generally otherwise he is Ovidian, in reply to Chaucer's uncharacteristic usage, preferring Ovid [when he constructs his image of Fama in House of Fame, 713–20] where more often he used Virgil" (951). Christ discusses Heinrich von Veldeke's Eneit (ca. 1175), written in a Dutch literary dialect; its model, the anonymous Old French Roman d'Énéas (ca. 1160); and Vergil's Aeneid. Cornelius situates the moral and political thought of John Gower's Visio Anglie (1381) within its Vergilian intertext. Deist compares Vergil's imagery with that of the Roman d'Énéas. Eitel writes about the influence of the Eclogues on Dante and on his contemporary Giovanni del Virgilio (d. 1319). Mordeglia analyzes a tenth-century allegorical poem that alludes to a number of classical authors through a late-antique and medieval poetic filter; the allusions include forty-four citations of Vergil, with a directness of citation that suggests a parodic treatment. Nazzaro writes about the development of the Christian interpretation of Vergil, especially of the fourth eclogue, in the patristic and medieval worlds, with attention to Lactantius, Constantine, Augustine, Quodvultdeus, and Dante. Wingfield's book contains a chapter on “Gavin Douglas’ Eneados” (150–77). The Scottish poet Gavin Douglas (ca. 1476–1522) produced the first complete translation of the Aeneid into English (1513).

- Rogerson, Anne. “Vegio’s Ascanius: Problems in the Continuation of the Aeneid.” CRJ 5 (2013): 106–25.

Edgecombe’s notes include discussion of an allusion to the Aeneid in a play by the English writer John Lyly (ca. 1553 or 1554–1606). Putnam writes about the influence of Vergil on the ekphrastic technique of Neapolitan humanist Jacopo Sannazaro (1458–1530) in his De partu virginis. Rogerson reinterprets Maffeo Vegio’s fifteenth-century Supplement to the “Aeneid,” observing that “Vegio does not, as some contemporaries did, criticize Aeneas overtly. He does, however, pointedly sideline and diminish the figure of Aeneas’ son, Ascanius, to the extent that his succession to his father’s position becomes doubtful” (106).

Paradisi studies Vergil's influence on the Latin hexameter hymns written by the poet Giovanni Pascoli (1855–1912) to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of Italy's unification in 1911. Torlone analyzes the "reconfiguring" by Joseph Brodsky (1940–96) "of Vergil's pastoral poetry, specifically, the reshaping of the pastoral space in the Russian poet's eclogues" (285).

Vergils Aeneis in vier Zyklen von Buch-Illustrationen des 16. und 17. Jahrhunderts: Der "Venezianische Vergil" nach der Straßburger Ausgabe von 1502, der "Londoner Vergil" von 1658, der "Augsburger Vergil" von J. A. Thelot (1655–1734), der "Nürnberg Vergil" von 1688. Edited by Ulrich Wilke and Werner Suerbaum. Neukirchen: Make a Book, 2014.

Bini writes about the influence of Vergil on the Italian Mannerist painter Nicolò dell'Abate (1509–71). Roethlisberger's forty-seven-page Claude Lorrain contains black-and-white and color images of the illustrations by Claude Lorrain (1600–1682) of the Iliad and Aeneid. Dimundo discusses the opera Dido and Aeneas by Henry Purcell (1659–95). Pinotti's forty-page catalog for an exhibition at the Museo Virgiliano, Pietole di Virgilio (Mantua), October 12–November 10, 2013, illustrates the work of a number of contemporary artists, mostly from the region of Mantua. Tittle discusses the unfinished Pre-Raphaelite manuscript of the Aeneid handwritten by the craftsman and designer William Morris (1834–96) and illuminated by the artist Edward Burne-Jones (1833–98). Wilke and Suerbaum present four collections of book illustrations. These include selections from Sebastian Brant's publication in Strassburg (1502) of the first large illustrated edition of Vergil's works, which contained more than two hundred woodcuts; from John Ogilby's London edition (1658), featuring over one hundred etchings; from the Aeneid printed in Nürnberg (1688) by the painter Georg Jacob Lang and the engraver Georg Christoph Eimmart, with fifty-one etchings; and the twenty-four etchings illustrating the first four books of the Aeneid created by the goldsmith Johann Andreas Thelot (1655–1734) in Augsburg. Each of the collections is also available as a separate publication.
