Kayachev (2017) suggests that at Ciris 288 we read “te propter” in place of the transmitted “semper aut,” and at 289 we read “nunc” instead of “aut.” The passage should read “te propter mi olim natae, te propter eundem / nunc amor insanae luctum portauit alumnae.” Sommer-Weisel’s unpublished commentary is available through download at https://lmu-munich.academia.edu/Departments/Department\_of\_Greek\_and\_Latin\_Philology/Documents.

Vergil. Virgilio: Eneide 2. Edited by Sergio Casali. Pisa: Edizioni della Normale, 2017.

Luginbill observes that Peerlkamp may have been right in transposing lines 84–85 in book 4 to follow line 79 and suggests plausible reasons for the scribal error. At lines 82–83 Dido is not holding Ascanius on her lap but is alone (sola). Casali’s edition of Aeneid 2 and commentary is designed to meet the needs of contemporary Italian university students.

- Suerbaum, Werner. "Vergil über Ankunft, Aufnahme und Integration von Flüchtlingen." Forum Classicum 59 (2016): 128–43.

Davis "revisits the issue of the nature and scope of Aeneas' angry outburst from both an ethnographic and philosophical perspective. The execution of Turnus is shown to be totally consistent with, even required by, Roman norms of pietas and its core obligations. In terms of the ethical implications of the episode, the violent ira displayed by Aeneas is fundamentally consonant with Epicurean thought on the subject of justified anger—a subject with which Vergil was demonstrably steeped" (169). Geymonat writes about the unification of the Trojans with the Latins in Aen. 12. Loar proposes "that Vergil uses the image of a triumphant Hercules [at Aen. 8.200–204] as a way to tap into a rich layer of Republican triumphal history that is instantiated in Rome's monuments, portraying Augustus ultimately as one more in the long line of notable Republican triumphatores" (46). Suerbaum considers the experiences of the Trojans in the second half of the Aeneid from the perspective of contemporary refugees.

Monreal reconsiders the possibility that the aetiological tale of Camilla’s upbringing (Aen. 11–537b–584a) is a parenthetical assertion by the epic narrator rather than a tale told by Diana within a section of direct speech (535b–594), as is usually thought.

Cugusi discusses the heterogeneous character of twenty-eight inscriptional poems from Roman Britain dating from the first through sixth centuries, some of which contain Vergilian echoes. Goldschmidt's paper focuses on the ways in which Horace, Vergil, and Livy responded to Carthage and the Punic Wars. Guittard contemplates the concept of the Augustan return of the Golden Age in Vergil's Eclogues, Georgics, and Aeneid. Nelis studies the ways in which the names Maecenas, Vergilius, and Caesar function within the Georgics and how they illuminate the relationship between the poem and its historical context. Pagliara untangles the complex literary tradition concerning the Ausones of ancient Italy: the ethnic Ausones are mentioned in historical and geographical sources on Campania; but in Greek poetry Ausonia occurs simply as a synonym for Italy. Vergil first uses Ausonii of the peoples allied with Turnus, then extends the term to all the people included in Aeneas's pax, "thus foreshadowing the future pax Augusta; finally, with a natural shift, he applies it to the Romans, who inherit all that world." Thus "Virgil inserts in his erudite reconstruction of the ancient peopling of Italy the old Greek notion of Ausones, which he borrowed in its usefully adaptable semantic vagueness from his Hellenistic poetic sources.” Simon uses the role of Juno in the Aeneid to interpret the sacrificial relief depicting Aeneas on the Ara Pacis. The relief refers not to a sacrifice to the Penates in Lavinium but to a sacrifice to Juno on the Tiber.

Capdeville discusses two epic poems by poets contemporary with Vergil who took different approaches to legendary Roman history: Iullus Antonius, son of M. Antonius and Fulvia, wrote a twelve-book poem on Diomedes’s founding of Adria on the east coast of Italy after a shipwreck; and a certain Largus wrote about the Trojan Antenor’s founding of Padova. Davis “reflects on the changing nature of free speech in the Augustan period” through an examination of the council of the Latins in Aen. 11, in which “Drances can demand freedom of speech in a public context,” and “a sequence of stories in Metamorphoses 2 and 3 in which outspokenness is punished. ... This reflects, I suggest, the altered political circumstances between the 20s BCE and the first decade CE” (183). Feeney concentrates on Horace’s reception of Homer, Ennius, and Vergil. Ficca discusses the imitation in the Epicdion Drusi of several passages in the Aeneid, in particular Aen. 7.31–65, 86–89, and 8.29–36. Goh observes that Ovid “toys with” the Aeneid by making the first two poems of his Amores into a mini-Aeneid: Am. 1.1.1 opens with arma, while Am. 1.2 represents the epic’s second half. Schwartz Frydman uses evidence from Seneca’s Controversiae to show how L. Cestius Pius, a Greek rhetor from Smyrna (fl. 13 B.C.), integrated himself into Latin literary culture through his imitation of Cicero and Vergil.

Burghini and Uría draw attention to Consentius's discussion, in De barbarismis et metaplasms, of vowel shortening at Aen. 3.602 (scio) and Georg. 1.232 (duodena). Feeney considers the first similes in Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, Lucretius's De rerum natura, and Vergil's Aeneid, all of which introduce narrative techniques and themes that carry through the poem as a whole. Fontaine argues that "several puns in the poetry of Virgil, Lucretius, and Catullus ... are better explained by a psycholinguistic than a psychoanalytic (Freudian) model. Since they appear in correct, ordinary speech—in contrast to Freudian slips, in which a pun results from a speech error—I call those puns 'Freudian bullseyes'" (131). Katz "provides a critical survey of the evidence" of authorial signatures in Vergil's poetry "and proposes one more example: the acronym M-VER-P spelled out by the first three words of a self-referential passage near the end of Book 2 of the Georgics, me uero primum (2.475).” Martín Puente analyzes why passages in Horace, Ovid, and Vergil (Aen. 2.567–88) have been considered spurious and considers circumstances that could lead to confirming their authenticity, above all the role of the author as publisher of his own works. O’Hara’s expanded edition contains a new introduction focusing on the work of other scholars that has appeared since the 1st ed. (1996); more than 100 new examples; and an updated bibliography containing more than 250 new items. “Through wordplay with amor and Roma,” Reed “explores places in Virgil’s poem where mora—charged variously with a sense of deferral, hesitation, or obstruction—meaningfully interacts with ideas of desire and national foundation” (87).

Audano (2015b) reviews M. T. Galli’s I “Vergiliocentones minores” del codice Salmasiano (2014). Florio discusses the ambivalence of the church fathers concerning the cosmologies of Lucretius and Vergil. Fucecchi studies the influence of Ovid and Vergil on Statius, Th. 12.810–15, Valerius Flaccus, and Silius Italicus. Galli Milić notes that Lucan’s conception of furor as a Roman characteristic and within the context of civil war responds to Vergil’s. Geue shows that Ecl. 1 is the relevant source for the conception of exile in Juvenal, Sat. 3. Kidd discusses a philosophical exercise Augustine describes near the beginning of De magistro in which he and his son discuss a line from Vergil’s Aeneid. Kochenash interprets Acts 9.32–35, an account of Peter healing a man named Aeneas, as a literary signpost pointing to Rome. “The balance of Luke’s narrative consists of negotiating and expanding the gentile mission and progressively moving toward the city of Rome.” MacRae recognizes at Suetonius, Tit. 7.2 a window allusion to Catullus 66.39–40 through Aen. 4.640. Marpicati writes about the pseudo-Ovidian Argumenta Aeneidos preserved in the Anthologia Latina (1–2 Shackleton Bailey). Pyy writes about Vergil and Lucan. Simon’s discussion considers bucolic poetry from Calpurnius Siculus onwards. Trout discusses a fourteen-line epigram preserved in a manuscript of Prudentius that was inscribed on a tablet in the basilica of Saint Agnes dedicated in 340 and which may have been written by Constantina, daughter of Constantine. The first line of the epigram alludes to Aen. 3.321, line 5 to Ovid, Trist. 3.7.19–20. Walambali Geana concludes that Tacitus was influenced by the Vergilian concepts of fatum and libertas. Ware suggests that “da protinus arma” at Claudian, 4 Cons. 364, does not mean “bring me my weapons” but “bring me my Aeneid.” Honorius, Theodosius’s young son, needs his text of Vergil because his memory is faulty, a characteristic that indicates that his education is not complete.

Antonetz (title sic) argues that Vergil knew Cicero’s poem Marius (a fragment of which is quoted at De div. 1.47) and was influenced by its meter and style. Beck observes “that Vergil deploys motivations for the Aeneid in such a way as to imitate some of the problematic aspects of the motivations for the plots of the Homeric poems, taking into account ancient commentaries on those passages and expanding on the errors and ambiguities they point to” (58). Gagliardi (2015) notes that the epithet “formosus” is practically absent from Roman poetry before Vergil, who uses it in the Eclogues in contexts that form a literary dialogue with Gallus. Hardie discusses allusions to Catullus in Ecl. 4, Georg. 4, and in the Aeneid. Pataki suggests that Vergil’s reference to Parthenope at the end of the Georgics may allude, among other things, to Parthenius of Nicaea and his collection of erotic myths. It may even be that the mythological allusions to the origins of plants and animals in the Georgics were inspired by Parthenius.

Foster argues that Servius’s commentaries on Vergil provide insight into what might have happened in his classroom. His teaching had to enable students who did not all speak Latin as a native language to recognize both archaic and contemporary Latin and to distinguish between different formal registers, including prose and verse. Lunelli discusses a Vergilian scholion in the margin of Verona, Biblioteca Capitolare, MS XL (olim 38), fol. 253r, with its controversial claim for the existence of a cult of Apollo near Padua. Peirano considers how ancient authorial ascriptions function as paratexts, claiming authority for the text even when that authority may sometimes be faked. Smith observes that Cato is cited by Servius more than any other historian, “and looked at the other way round, Servius is a very important source for our knowledge of Cato.” His study asks “what we learn from Servius' use of Cato, and what we learn about Virgil." Squillante writes that Vergil's favorable depiction of the cities of Italy was a way of honoring the Augustan program. This perspective influenced later Latin literature from Pliny to Claudian to Namatianus and is amplified in Servius and other late antique commentaries in the context of the revival of imperial ideology in the late fourth and early fifth centuries. Stok's goal is to reconstruct the Vergilian text commented on by Servius Danielis (DS). He considers instances where DS proposes a lemma different from that of Servius; lemmas in DS not commented on by Servius; and cases in which DS reports variants of Vergil's transmitted text.

Bernabò, in a reassessment that is "entirely an art historian investigation," discusses the Vergilius Romanus (Rome, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, cod. Vat. Lat. 3867. "Unconvinced of the claims that the manuscript was produced either in Italy (i.e., Rome or Ravenna) or Constantinople, I argue for an origin in a Western province of the Roman Empire, probably southern Gaul" (239). Dickey discusses "bilingual papyrus texts of Vergil and Cicero, with the Latin original and a Greek translation arranged in distinctive narrow columns," which provide "a unique window" into the experience of nonnative Latin speakers learning to read the classics of Latin literature. This system of exegesis "was fundamental to ancient learning" but has "been overlooked and misunderstood in modern times, in part because it has no parallel in modern teaching or scholarship" (807). Columnar translation probably developed from columnar glossaries. Fusi endorses Heinsius's emendation of "variisque" to "Phariisque" at Aen. 8.685. Huyck clarifies Turnus's furious speech to his men in Aen. 9, who are shaken after having witnessed the transformation of the Trojan ships, by emendation. "The difficulty of construing the words penitus ... / femineum (141–142), whether with non or the variant nunc, has long been noted by commentators.” He proposes reading “sed periisse semel satis est: peccare fuisset / ante satis. <pereat>, penitus modo, nunc genus omne / femineum!” This translates to “But it’s enough (for them) to have perished once, (someone will say). (Then) it should have been enough (for them) to pursue their adulteries beforehand. May the whole womanish race perish here and now, provided (that it perish) for good!” He adduces Il. 9.375–77 as “a previously undetected model” (245). Vallat regards the Latin and Greek explanatory glosses found in the second part of Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, MS lat. 11308, as late antique pedagogical glosses intended for students at an elementary level who are not yet ready to read Vergil with a commentary such as that of Servius.

THE MIDDLE AGES

Lagomarsini, Claudio. “Per l’edizione del Libro dell’Eneyda di Ciampolo di Meo degli Ugurgieri da Siena.” Studi di Filologia Italiana 73 (2015): 67–97.
O’Sullivan, Sinéad. “Glossing Vergil and Pagan Learning in the Carolingian Age.” Speculum 93 (forthcoming, 2018).

Ciampolo di Meo degli Ugurgieri, the subject of Lagomarsini’s study, was the first to translate the Aeneid into Italian. O’Sullivan finds in the glosses of the ninth-century Oxford, Bodleian Library, MS Auct. F.2.8 “a strong endorsement of pagan learning” and an interest in encyclopedism. The glosses show “that it was not only Vergil’s style but also his content that engaged Christian readers.” This conclusion “challenges the older view of confrontation between pagan and Christian cultures.”

RENAISSANCE AND TUDOR WRITERS

Guizzi, Francesco. “In mezzo mar: Creta fra Dante e Virgilio; una nota.” In Raviola et al., Scritti per Lorenzo Braccesi (2013), 825–31.
Hardie, Philip. “Adamastor and the Epic Poet’s Dark Continent.” In Hardie, Augustan Poetry and the Irrational (2016), 281–92.

Guizzi notes that the idea that Crete was deserted after the Trojan War (Aen. 3.121–23), not mentioned by Homer, was later picked up on by Dante, Inferno 14.99. Hardie “examines the classical, above all Virgilian, models for Adamastor, the monstrous personification of the Cape of Good Hope who utters a curse against Vasco da Gama’s sailor” (281) in Luís Vaz de Camões’s Lusiads (os Lusíadas), a Portuguese epic poem published in 1572 on Vasco da Gama’s voyage to India.

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Puche, Océane. “Virgile et Ovide dans la querelle des anciens et des modernes: La traduction de l’Héroïde VII par Marie-Jeanne L’Héritier.” In Clément-Tarantino and Klein, La représentation du “couple” Virgile-Ovide dans la tradition culturelle (2015), 299–311.

Puche studies Marie-Jeanne L’Héritier de Villandon’s Épîtres héroïques d’Ovide traduites en vers françois (Paris, 1732) in order to illuminate the role of her poetry in the reception of Vergil and Ovid in the eighteenth century.

NINETEENTH CENTURY

Riddiford, Alexander. Madly after the Muses: Bengali Poet Michael Madhusudan Datta and His Reception of the Graeco-Roman Classics. Classical Presences. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2013.

Stryer, Steven. “A Loftier Tone’: ‘Laodamia,’ the Aeneid, and Wordsworth’s Virgilian Imagination.” SPh 112 (2015): 575–97.

Riddiford explores classical influences on the writings of the nineteenth-century Bengali poet and playwright Michael Madhusudan Datta (1824–73). “His oeuvre, which includes a Bengali play dramatizing a Hindu version of the Judgement of Paris, a retelling of the Sanskrit Ramayana using various Vergilian and Homeric tropes, a Hindu response to Ovid’s Heroides, and a Bengali prose version of the first half of Homer’s Iliad, utilize the Greek and Roman classics in a surprising and subversive way” (dustjacket).

TWENTIETH CENTURY

Leary, Daniel. “Virgilian Echoes: Arms and the Man and the Aeneid.” Shaw 37/1 (2017): 101–34.

Rosenblitt, Alison. “A Twilight Smelling of Vergil’: E. E. Cummings, Classics, and the Great War.” G&R 62 (2014): 242–60.

Solaro, Giuseppe. “Virgilio e l’Europa cristiana: A proposito di Thomas Stearns Eliot.” In Sulle orme degli antichi: Scritti di filologia e di storia della tradizione classica offerti a Salvatore Cerasuolo, edited by Mario Capasso, 715–26. Lecce: Pensa MultiMedia, 2016.

Sproll, Heinz. “Das Paradigma Rom als Matrix politischer Exzellenz: Hannah Arendts referentieller Diskurs zu Vergil und Augustus im reziproken hermeneutischen Bezug zu ihrer Deutung der amerikanischen Revolution.” HJ 135 (2015): 503–23.

Leary considers Vergilian allusions in George Bernard Shaw’s Arms and the Man (first performed in 1894). Solaro considers T. S. Eliot’s paper “What Is a Classic?” and his other writings. “What emerges,” he concludes, is a “modern and contemporary vision of classical culture and education” in which “the personality of Virgil and the relationship of this author with the Christian world” are central.

VERGIL AND THE ARTS

Alonso Fernández, Zoa. “Epic in Motion: La Didone by Salvatore Viganò and Virgil’s Aeneid.” CRJ 9 (2017): 400–25.

Eastin, Kristi. “Visualizing Virgil: The Pictorial Agenda(s) of Sebastian Brant.” Mouseion (Canada) 57 (2016): 85–129.

Gesztelyi, Tamás. “Eneide nel Sebasteion ad Afrodisia.” Eidola: International Journal of Classical Art History 9 (2012): 129–40.

Heslin, Peter. The Museum of Augustus: The Temple of Apollo in Pompeii, the Portico of Philippus in Rome, and Latin Poetry. Los Angeles: J. Paul Getty Museum, 2015.

Venturini, Filippo. “‘Stetit acer in armis Aeneas’: Il libro XII dell’Eneide in un mosaico della Lusitania.” Latomus 75 (2016): 98–115.

Alonso Fernández reads the libretto of La Didone, a coreodramma (dramatic ballet) by the Italian choreographer and composer Salvatore Viganò (1769–1821) that reconfigured the Dido story in Aen. 1 and 4, with attention to the corporeal and kinaesthetic potential in Vergil’s story. She argues that “these traces of bodily movement and expressivity were motivated by the ... performance culture in Augustan times, in particular, by the growing trend of pantomime dancing” (400). Eastin interprets the visual anachronisms in the first illustrated print edition of Vergil’s works, “published in Strasbourg in 1502 under the direction of the German humanist Sebastian Brant” (1457–1521). The anachronisms “serve as visual translations that capture the greater message of Virgil’s poetry and so help to interpret the social, political, and artistic concerns of both Virgil and Brant” (85). Gesztelyi demonstrates that the Julio-Claudian Sebasteion built in Aphrodisias contains reliefs depicting scenes from the Aeneid that show iconographic parallels with some of the illustrations in Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, MS Vat. lat. 3225. Heslin argues that the poetry of Vergil, Horace, and Propertius was influenced by paintings of the Trojan War. Venturini compares a fourth-century mosaic depicting Aeneas and Turnus from the House of Medusa at Alter do Chão, Portugal, with Aen. 12.919–52, the passage it illustrates.
