Calvert discusses the 1649 and 1654 editions of John Ogilby's (1600–1676) translations of the Aeneid. Cox discusses the French translation of Aen. 2 by Marie de Gournay (1565–1645). Davis edits and comments on the translation by Joseph Addison (1672–1719) of a section of Aen. 3 in the style of John Milton (1608–74). Both Desrosiers and Ehrling and Karlsson discuss the translation of Aen. 1–4 into French prose by Hélienne de Crenne (ca. 1510–1552?). Eigler (second title) discusses the Aeneid translation by the Italian filmmaker and poet Pier Paolo Pasolini (1922–75). Fabre-Serris writes on the translations of the Eclogues into French by Paul Valéry (1871–1945) and Marcel Pagnol (1895–1974). Falconer discusses Seamus Heaney’s (1939–2013) Aeneid. Gautier discusses the French adaptation by Joachim Du Bellay (1522–60). Hardie discusses a partial translation of the Aeneid by William Wordsworth (1770–1850). Lagomarsini offers a critical edition of the first Italian translation of the Aeneid by Ciampolo di Meo degli Ugurgieri (b. 1290–95). Leahy discusses Gavin Douglas’s (1474–1522) Aeneid. Marinčič discusses the translation by Jožef Šubic (1802–61) of the Georgics into Slovenian; Mistretta their French translation by Jacques Delille (1738–1813). Papaioannou discusses the Greek Aeneid by Eugenios Voulgaris (1716–1806). Rupp considers the Spanish translation of Aen. 2 by Gregorio Hernández de Velasco (1525?–1577 or 1586). Santos and Dias translate the Copa of the Appendix Vergiliana into Portuguese. Scafoglio discusses the Italian translation of Aen. 2 by Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837). Sowerby compares John Dryden’s translation of “The entire episode of Nisus and Euryalus, translated from the Fifth and Ninth Books of Virgil’s Aeneid,” included in Sylvae: or, the Second Part of Miscellany Poems (1685); and a “paraphrase” by Byron included in his juvenile miscellany of 1807, Hours of Idleness. Torlone discusses Vasilii Zhukovskii (1783–1852) and Russian translations of the Aeneid.

Breglia discusses evidence from the Catalepton. At Ciris 288 Kayachev (2017) proposes reading te propter in place of the transmitted semper aut, and at 289 reading nunc instead of aut. The passage should read: te propter mi olim natae, te propter eundem / nunc amor insanae luctum portauit alumnae. Kayachev (2016) suggests reading videndus instead of videmus at Ciris 524, comparing Lucretius 5.1198–1210. Welsh argues that the Aetna should be read as “poetry as science,” a shift of interpretation that illuminates the poem’s empiricism, its relationship to its didactic predecessors, and the coherence of its contents.

ECLOGUES: GENERAL

- Keeline, Tom. “A Poet on the Margins: Vergil and the Theocritean Scholia.” CPh 112 (2017): 456–78.
- López Romero, Maria. “De adventu noctis in Eclogis Vergilii.” VoxLat 53, no. 210 (2017): 539–41.

The first sentence of Keeline’s article is: “Publius Vergilius Maro was in a sense a late Hellenistic poet writing in a barbarian dialect.” He demonstrates that Vergil’s “minute and sustained engagement with Theocritus” must mean that Vergil, “the ‘Alexandrian’ poet,” made use of a scholarly commentary when writing his Eclogues.

- Peraki-Kyriakidou, Eleni. “Το γέλιο του ακάνθου (Βιργιλίου, Εκλογή 4, 20) [The laughing acanthus (Virgil, Eclogue 4, 20)].” In Michalopoulos, Voutsinou-Kikilia, and Papaioannou, Rideamus igitur, 91–99.

Breed examines textuality and intertextuality in Theocritus 2, Virgil, Ecl. 2, and Tibullus 1.2—poems placed in positions within a collection where meaning is “not yet locked into a pattern but emerging and undergoing revision” (117). Kronenberg observes an acrostic decate, “tenth,” at Ecl. 4.9–11 that is relevant for its Sybilline context.

Adema specifically considers Caesar, Gall. 1 and 7 and Aen. 11 and 12. The special issue of Classical World (111, no. 1 [2017]) edited by Julia Hejduk presents brief responses to her prompt: "What does the Harvard School mean, or mean to me? How has it affected my reading of Vergil, or my scholarship, or my life?" (2). Respondents were Ward W. Briggs, Sergio Casali, Raymond J. Clark, James J. Clauss, Joseph Farrell, Karl Galinsky, Stephen J. Harrison, Richard Jenkins, W. R. Johnson, Christine G. Perkell, Craig Kallendorf, Duncan F. Kennedy, Charles Martindale, Anton Powell, Michael C. J. Putnam, Jay Reed, Sarah Spence, Hans-Peter Stahl, Richard F. Thomas, Clifford Weber, Susan Ford Wiltshire, and James Zetzel. Faber, in his study of Latin epic poetry, writes, "The concept of intermediality arose in the theoretical discourse about the relations between different systems or products of meaning, such as the relations between music and art, or image and text." He addresses intermedial connections "whereby attention is drawn to another system of meaning, as in the references in literature to a work of art" (1). Mac Góráin uses Paratexts (1997) by Gérard Genette, a central focus of which is “how modern authors’ and publishers’ paratexts comment on publication, republication, responses to criticism, and so on” (424) to “provide the scaffolding to build an argument about arma virumque, ‘arms and the man,’ in Virgil’s Aeneid and its tradition” (423). O’Hara responds to the papers delivered by Pandey and Torlone at a Vergilian Society panel provocatively entitled “Happy Golden Anniversary, Harvard School!” and here published in Classical World and offers some autobiographical remarks of his own. Ridd’s book, written for readers without knowledge of Greek or Latin, gives a close reading of passages from the Iliad, Odyssey, and Aeneid on the interconnecting themes of communication, love, and death. Smith discusses the notion that both Aeneas and Vergil, on his personal poetic path, take a journey that parallels the rhetorical-philosophical trek outlined by Cicero in the Tusculans. Torlone writes that “the continuous engagement with Vergil does not start in Russia until after the reforms of Peter the Great (1672–1725) and Catherine the Great (1729–1796).” But Russian reception of Vergil is complicated: “sometimes it is not Publius Vergilius Maro ... whom Russian writers are receiving, but a composite construct that has gone through the reception of influential (and at times even obscure) European writers and has been shaped by Russia’s cultural context” (28).

Biggs argues that "Mercury plays a significant role" in "Aeneas' maritime escape from Troy" and "may have played a more extensive role in aiding Aeneas' journey across the Mediterranean than is indicated by Servius' comment that the god built his ship" (220, uncorrected proof). This role was prominent in Naevius's Bellum Punicum and in later literary and art historical sources but is not Vergilian. Hardie discusses the pairing of Dido and Lucretia, as chaste women who chose suicide rather than disgrace, in a later tradition starting with the church fathers.

Fernández Martínez and Limón Belén offer an updated edition and philological commentary on CIL 13.2038, a metrical epitaph that contains allusions to Vergil and Catullus. Gonçalves and Mota analyze the heroic genealogy of the Julian gens in order to understand how this is accommodated to the epic architecture of the Aeneid. Van Kasteel demonstrates that the scenes in the hypogeum of the Porta Maggiore constitute a commentary on the text of the Aeneid.

Cowan points out that resonantia saxa at Ovid, Metam. 8.18 echoes the description of Scylla's lair at Aen. 3.432. Fratantuono notes that Ovid's representation of Apollo and Daphne in the passage beginning at Metam. 1.452 has parallels with Vergil's Aeneas and Dido. Gagliardi argues for the chronological priority of Gallus's poetry to the second Eclogue. Kraggerud argues that Vergili mentioned at Horace, Carm. 4.12.13, is Vergilius Eurysaces, not P. Vergilius Maro.

Biddau critiques Adkin (2015); Adkin (2016) offers a response. Franko observes that Vergil's invocations of seasons in similes tend to indicate the onset or termination of a season and thus signal transitions, growth, or decay.

Casali discusses the Nisus and Euryalus episode in the Aeneid; the nocturnal massacre in Statius, Th. 10; and the Doloneia in Silius Italicus's Punica. Duval observes that ancient evidence for the Sortes Vergilianae is attested only in the Historia Augusta, whereas the Sortes Homericæ are witnessed in three papyri. Fratantuono notices that the first book of Quintus of Smyrna's Posthomerica manipulates and reverses the plot of Aen. 11. Houghton cites Tibullus 1.3.35–50, Horace, Carm. saec. 57–60 and Carm. 4.2.37–40, and passages from Vergil himself that demonstrate early responses to his fourth Eclogue. López Romero notes that Seneca's maiora notis monstra alludes to nota maior imago at Aen. 2.773. Seidman observes that Tacitus's approach to the Teutoburg episode has much in common with Aeneas's viewing of the Trojan War mural at the Temple of Juno in Carthage (Aen. 1.451–65). Ware focuses on the fourth-century corpus of the Panegyrici Latini, whose orators "acknowledge Virgil as magnus poeta and cite him directly, particularly to evoke battle scenes, while also drawing on his work generally for poetic language and epic phrasing" (1). Yeates discusses the dependence of Apoc. 13.4–8 on Aen. 6.791–97 and on Manilius 1.799–800.

Estefanía Álvarez considers the influence of Lycophron's Alexandria on the episode of Troilus in Aen. 1.474–78 and suggests the possibility of a common source. Farley studies adaptations of Homer in order to make a scholarly distinction between the work of fan writers and the work of rewriters, such as Vergil and Alexander Pope. Fratantuono juxtaposes Aen. 6.125 and Hesiod, Th. 154 and following. Mellado Rodríguez examines parallels between Aen. 4.9–53 and Euripides's Hippolytus. O'Rourke observes that the intertextual relationship between reception narratives in the Aeneid (Aeneas and Evander) and Callimachus's Aetia (Heracles and Molercus) and Hecale (Theseus and Hecale) are significant.

Lagioia, with a view to a new edition of Servius's commentary, examines the first book of the Georgics to provide critical reflection on the edition of G. Thilo (1881–87) and on the criteria to be adopted for a new text. Pirovano's is the second part of a study of the manuscripts Bern, Burgerbibliothek 165 (T), and Vatican, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Vat. Lat. 1570 (F). Racine discusses the role of Greek in Servius's commentary and in the Roman education and culture of his day. Murgia and Kaster's edition is the first addition to the Harvard Servius to appear in over fifty years. Stok speculates that the word virgineum in the context of an acrostic at Georg. 1.430 may have suggested his ancient nickname Parthenias that, according to Donatus in his Vita Vergili, was assigned to Vergil in Naples. Uría finds a previously undetected connection between the earliest approaches to what is known as the septimus casus and those found in Servius's commentaries on Vergil, approaches that differ from those followed in the later grammarians. Vallat (2017) analyzes the transmission of Varro in late antique Vergil commentaries, discussing the reliability of authors' names and titles of works in citations, forms of quotation, complications entailed by manuscript transmission, and other issues.

Estefanía Álvarez analyzes variants in Toledo, Bibl. Capit., MS 102–2, that differ from those accepted in recent editions of the Aeneid. La Barbera argues that the verb transabeo is only witnessed in the Flavian era; at Aen. 9.431 we should read transadigit. Mantelli prefers qua at Aen. 6.95–96 to quam.

Appleton and Robinson write on the Anglo-Latin hagiography Vita Sancti Guthlaci, concerning the hermit Guthlac of Crowland (d. 714), written by a certain Felix ca. 730–40. Davies discusses the reception of the magical and prophetic Vergil of popular legend and the place of the Eclogues, Georgics, and Aeneid in Wales from the Middle Ages on. Florano and Zorzetti discuss Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–75). Iafrate touches on the medieval literary persona of Vergil as a magician who could capture demons in a bottle. Ibáñez Chacón discusses the Liber monstrorum, a late seventh- or early eighth-century catalog of marvelous creatures whose mythological narratives are drawn largely from Vergil. Martin “focuses on Heinrich von Veldeke’s Eneasroman (ca. 1186), the first courtly romance written in German. It is an adaptation of the Old French Roman d’Eneas (c. 1160), itself an adaptation of Vergil’s Aeneid” (18). O’Sullivan discusses Oxford, Bodleian Library, MS Auct. F.2.8. Perucchi discusses Francesco Petrarch (1304–74). Ratkowitsch demonstrates that the Latin poem Waltharius depends on the Aeneid for individual motifs and overall structure. Ricklin discusses the influence of the medieval legends about Vergil on William of Malmesbury’s (1080–1143) depiction of Sylvester II as a necromantic philosopher.

Abbamonte observes that the humanist Giuniano Maio (1430–93) derived his quotations from Vergil from second-hand sources (Servius, Nonius, Gellius, and others). Auger discusses Cristoforo Landino (1424–98). Basu considers the Arcadia of Philip Sidney (1554–86) as a form of fan fiction of the Eclogues. Béhar discusses the influence of Eurydice in Georg. 4 on the character of Elisa in the third Eclogue of Garcilaso de la Vega (1501–36). Cappelli analyzes quotations from Vergil in Neapolitan political treatises by Giovanni Pontano (1426–1503), Francesco Patrizi (1529–97), and Giuniano Maio. Casanova-Robin considers the meaning behind the etiological tale about Vergil's birth devised by Pontano in elegy 1.14 of his Eridanus. Deramaix discusses the imitation of Vergil in the writings of Jacopo Sannazaro (1458–1530). Escobar Borrego writes about the concept of Vergil's Arcadia and its influence on Don Alonso Pérez de Guzmán (1550–1615) and suggests that Soledades and Retrato by his son Pedro Espinosa (1578–1650) are best understood in that context. Disagreeing with twentieth-century views that take Lucan's Bellum civile as a parodic subversion of Vergil, Facchini argues that Dante regards the epics of Vergil and Lucan as consonant with each other. Ferreri offers reflections on sources pertaining to the Vergilian exegesis of Aulo Giano Parrasio (Aulus Janus Parrhasius) (1470–1522) in order to focus on his commentaries on Horace's Ars poetica, on Claudianus's De raptu Proserpinae, and on his own De rebus per epistolam quaesitis. Foley compares Cristoforo Landino's (1424–98) interpretation of the Aeneid, which he read as a moral allegory of the soul's progression to philosophical wisdom, with the similar interpretive scheme that Marsilio Ficino (1433–99) applied to the dialogues of Plato. Gevrey discusses Les exilés de la cour d'Auguste by Marie-Catherine de Villedieu (1640–83). Hampton writes about Os Lusíadas by Luís de Camões (1524–80). Holmes notes that the embrace between Vergil and Sordello, a thirteenth-century troubadour born, like Vergil, in Mantua, "binds with love ... all of Italy's previously scattered languages, literary genres, and political ideologies" (106). Houghton, "Virgil," considers "the contribution made by poetic imagery derived from the work of Virgil," in particular from "the fourth Eclogue, to contemporary formulations of the concept of the Renaissance itself" (203). Laterza considers Vergil's use of pathetic fallacy in the cave scene in Aen. 4 and how it was reworked in Renaissance literature. Lovatt explores the use of Vergil's underworld and the reworking of Dante in Renaissance Florence by Ugolino Verino (1438–1516) in his epic poem Carlias. MacCarthy's essay focuses on the "poet-musician Iopas [at Aen. 1.740–47], the subject of his banquet song and the increased interest in him as a musician and poet by late medieval and early Renaissance writers" (85–86). Marshall writes that in 1592 "Robert Greene warned his fellow playwrights that 'there is an upstart Crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his Tigers hart wrapped in a players hyde, supposes he is as well able to blast out a blank verse as the best of us.'" Greene almost certainly meant William Shakespeare as the upstart crow, and drew the image from Vergil's cornix ... improba at Georg. 1.388–89, which he must have known in Latin. Marsico writes on Lorenzo Valla (1407–57). Martín Romano writes about the major influence of the Aeneid on the epic poem Nuevo Mundo y conquista by Francisco de Terrazas (1540–1600), the first Mexican poet. Martindale considers the period from Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey (1517–47) to Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–92). Mauriello takes Arcadia and Eclogae piscatoriae by Sannazaro as a starting point to examine vernacular bucolic in Italy during the sixteenth century, focusing ultimately on the poetry of Luigi Tansillo (1510–68) and Berardino Rota (1508–75). Michon discusses Pierre-Valentin Faydit's (1644–1709) reception of Vergil. Milette observes that an elegy by Francesco Peto da Fondi (1480?–after 1531), following Servius's commentary, offers an antiquarian inquiry on Amyclae, the Spartan colony in southern Latium mentioned at Aen. 10.564. Molins discusses Joachim Du Bellay (1522–60). Mussio maintains that Dante's interpretation of Vergil's Amata in Purg. 17 as an example of wrath is consistent with his treatment of Amata in Epist. 7. Nassichuk focuses on an elegiac poem by Nicolas Chesneau (1521–81). Pérez-Abadín Barro discusses the Églogas pastoriles, modeled on Vergil's Eclogues, by Pedro de Padilla (1540–99). Pietras discusses The Shepheardes Calender by Edmund Spenser (1552–99). Potter writes on Christopher Marlowe (1564–93). Pugh focuses on Edmund Spenser's (1552–99) acknowledged debt in his pastoral poems to Vergil's Eclogues. Quint writes on Angelo Ambrogini (Poliziano) (1454–94). Reeser discusses Michel de Montaigne (1533–92). Rogerson writes about Maffeo Vegio's 1428 Supplement to the Aeneid, the "extraordinarily successful 'Aeneid 13'" (119). Wingfield examines the correspondences that might be drawn between a set of extracts from Julius Caesar Scaliger's (1494–1558) Epidorpidēs (published posthumously in 1573) copied in the Ruthven manuscript (Edinburgh, University Library, MS Dc.1.43) and the subsequent translation of Virgil's Aeneid by Gavin Douglas (1474–1522). Sérís writes on the neo-Latin poet Girolamo Angeriano (Hieronymus Angerianus, 1480–1512). Toscano writes about six eclogues by Giano Anisio (1465–1640) in his Varia poemata that blend Vergilian and contemporary influences. Tucker's subject is the sixteenth- to seventeenth-century Latin verse cento based preponderantly upon Vergil. Tufano considers a description of a firework display by Gabriele Altilio (1436–1501) that is modeled on Vergil's description of the burning of Troy.

- Vince, Mate. "Virgil in Ottoman Hungary: The Aeneid and Miklós Zrínyi's The Siege of Sziget (1651)." In Mack and North, The Afterlife of Virgil, 85–100.

Kantzios draws attention to François Fénelon's (1651–1715) novel The Adventures of Telemachus, Son of Ulysses (1699), which drew on the setting of Vergil's underworld to criticize the regime of Louis XIV. Vince considers Miklós Zrínyi (1620–64).

- Sjödin, Alfred. "Saint-Lambert, Oxenstierna et la 'mémoire du genre' géorgiche." Revue d'histoire littéraire de la France 117 (2017): 529–36.

O'Briain takes Dryden's 1697 translation of the Georgics as a case study to recover "a common history of georgic and fictionality that resides in [Vergil's and Dryden's] shared attention to craft labour" (317). Sjödin uses Bakhtin's theory of the mémoire du genre to study the influence of the Saisons by Jean-François de Saint-Lambert (1716–1803) in the work of the Swedish poet Johan Gabriel Oxenstierna (1750–1818), both of which stand as examples of Vergilian-inspired georgics.

NINETEENTH CENTURY

Burgersdijk, Diederik W. P. “Virgil in French Romanticism: Parallel Novels of Benjamin Constant and Germaine de Staël.” PVS 28 (2014): 141–72.

Burgersdijk suggests that both Adolphe (first published in 1816) by Benjamin Constant (1767–1830) and Corinne ou l'Italie (1807) by Germaine de Staël (1766–1817) are inspired by the Aeneid in structure, plot, and use of characters.

Strowick, Elisabeth. “Freuds Fluch.” MLN 131 (2016): 679–700.

Frost considers the question whether death provides a generative force in politics and points to the opinion of Hannah Arendt (1906–75), who felt that birth, not death, equipped us for the task of beginning and that the Aeneid shows the best understanding of this process. Marshall considers the place of Vergil in the poetic imagination of Tony Harrison (1937–). Nolden analyzes how Aimé Césaire (1913–2008) in his epic poem Cahier d’un retour au pays natal appropriates ancient epic as a point of departure for postcolonial writing, while also reflecting the subversive farce of Plautus. Rojcewicz writes on James Joyce (1882–1941). Strowick takes Juno’s declaration Flectere si nequeo superos, Acheronta movebo at Aen. 7.312, which Sigmund Freud took as a motto for his Interpretation of Dreams, as a starting point for her reading of Freud’s work.

Vitela, Lisa Boutin. "Virgilian Imagery and the Maiolica of the Mantuan Court." In Houghton and Sgarbi, Virgil and Renaissance Culture, 49–62.

Frick discusses the 1543 Worms edition of the Aeneid translation by Thomas Murner (1475–1537) into German, which included frontispieces that represented the content of each book visually and can only be understood by a reader who knows the entire Aeneid. Maass considers the art nouveau of Adolphe Giraldon (1855–1933) and the influence of Ecl. 1 and 4. Nollé writes about a medallion coined in Antandros in the Troad during the reign of Severus Alexandrinus that depicts the flight of Aeneas from Troy with Anchises and Ascanius. Vitela considers the maiolica dishes painted by Nicola da Urbino (active ca. 1520–1537/8) that were illustrated with classical narratives, including scenes inspired by the Aeneid and Ovid's Metamorphoses.
