- Romani Mistretta, Marco. 2017. “Le Virgile français: Jacques Delille's Commented Edition of the Aeneid.” IJCT 24: 175–97.

Frick considers the first translation of the Aeneid into German, by Thomas Murner (Strasbourg, 1515); and the later translation by Johannes Spreng, published posthumously in 1610. Heuzé discusses challenges encountered by translators of the Aeneid. After noting the influence of Johann Heinrich Voß's translation of Homer on metrical translations of Latin poetry, Holzberg argues for the possibility of a metrical translation of the Aeneid that avoids artificial and archaizing language. Paschalis discusses Renaissance humanists' translations of Vergil's Eclogues into Doric Greek hexameters, imitating the poetic style of Theocritus; and their translations of Theocritus into Latin prose or, less commonly, into Vergilian-style Latin hexameters. Homer was also translated into Vergilian hexameters. Romani Mistretta discusses the Latin text, French translation, notes, and illustrations of the Aeneid edited by Jacques Delille (1738–1813).

Kayachev offers a host of emendations in Ciris: at 68, he proposes ficto for the transmitted toto; after 73, suggests adding a line such as tu, pater, o Neptune pati male dignior illa and at 73 emending uiolauerat to uiolaueras; at 79 reads maris instead of malis; emends 86 to animos meretrix induta ferarum; proposes formosam at 90, comparing 487–89; reads candida caesaries florebant tempora circum at 121; suggests introducing a verb (uolet or uolat) at 204; at 264–65 proposes reading eheu, | qui dicam quoue ausa malum hoc exordiar ore?; and at 301, corrects obnix to obnixi, taking this word as an adjective. At Dirae 15 Kayachev proposes reading effetae Cererem sulcis condatis harenae, “may you bury wheat in furrows of sterile sand.” Olszaniec proposes reading candida Apollinea florebant tempora lauro at Ciris 121. Woytek’s article is an addendum to his book Die Ciris im Kontext der augusteischen Dichtung (2018).

- Venuti, Martina. 2017. “Deductum dicere carmen: nota a Verg. ecl. 6,5.” Paideia 72: 683–99.

Adkin finds an acrostic at Ecl. 8.6–13 (tu si es, accipe), which invites the recipient to accept the dedication. Bologna maintains that Vergil was familiar with Jewish ideas and writings. The biblical book Isaiah, which influenced the Sibylline oracles, may have been one of the most important. Kersten compares ἰοδνεφές at Od. 9.426, of the Cyclops’s sheep, to explain Vergil’s purple sheep in Ecl. 4. The color is a literary symbol for the poetic difficulties in comparing very different worlds and phases of time.

Barchiesi notes that Jupiter’s promise at Aen. 1.267–68 that Iulus (and the Julians) will start a new bloodline in Italy under a name that means “little Jupiter” finds support in the Origo gentis Romanae and in Cato’s Origines. Carstairs-McCarthy suggests that Vergil constructs a network of significant references to tunics and to the adoption of a son or a parent. These passages bear on the contrast between imposed (or public) pietas and chosen (or private) pietas and provide guidance on what motivates Aeneas’s fury in books 10 and 12. Giannotti remarks on how allusions to Il. 21.550–70 and 13.813–16 at Aen. 10.375–76 contribute to Pallas’s ideological and emotional characterization. Petrocheilos observes that Latinus is depicted as unable to control his emotions, a trait regarded as womanish. Sisul observes that the death of Troilus depicted in the temple of Juno in Aen. 1 anticipates the fates of young people in the second half of the work.

Hejduk discusses the significance of the acrostic ISAIA AIT ("Isaiah says") at Georg. 4.458–65 as one piece of evidence for the substantial role Judaism plays in Vergil's work. The acrostic was discovered by Alexei Grishin and discussed in a Harvard master's thesis (2009) directed by Richard Thomas. Moles speculates that the Cynic Antisthenes's educational doctrine underlies Aen. 6.847–53 (excurrent alii ...) and that Dio of Prusa was aware of this influence and incorporated Vergil's insight into his own response to the phenomenon of Roman power (Or. 13). Trinacty observes that "Vergil enriches his telling of Laocoön's death by linking mythical details with the iconography common to lararia in Campania."

- Watkins, John. 2018. After Lavinia: A Literary History of Premodern Marriage Diplomacy. Ithaca.

Bernard reviews Torelli and Marrone (2018), conceding that the evidence "that the sanctuary was intimately linked to Aeneas' arrival well before Vergil, when the deified hero's worship was first syncretized with the indigenous gods of Latium ... is far from straightforward, but the material is fascinating and has much to tell about the reception of the Trojan legends in Italy" (562). Kruschwitz demonstrates that an inscription from Rome (CIL 6.638 = ILS 2954) and one from Formiae (CIL 10.6127 = ILS 2955) cannot be adduced as evidence for the existence of later poets who wrote in the style of Vergil or Ovid. Rather, the names should be read as agnomina: the former memorial was dedicated by Q. Cestius Felix Vergilianus, a poet; and the latter by a poet whose agnomen was Ovidianus. Marcattili notes that the two men depicted on the reverse of a medallion in Parma, Museo Archeologico Nazionale, inv. 12497, are not to be identified as gladiators but as Aeneas defeating Turnus. Torelli and Marroni's book represents the final report on the excavations of 2002–7 of the sanctuary at the mouth of the Fosso dell'Incastro river below Ardea, a site that is probably the Castrum Inui mentioned at Aen. 6.775. Watkins's book "starts from a novel premise, that Aeneas's marriage to Lavinia in the Aeneid offered a paradigm for the interdynastic marriages—actual, fictional, and fictionalized—that provided a cornerstone for premodern European diplomacy and for the writers who negotiated these marriages and wrote about them" (with quotation from the review by C. Kallendorf, Vergilius 64 (2018): 212–14, at 212).

Buisel compares Horace's treatment of the murder of Remus and Vergil's treatment of Laomedon's deception as curses leading to civil war for their descendants. De Vasconcellos suggests that Horace's repetition of the vowel i in Carm. 1.24, his lament for the dead Quintilius, imitates Orpheus's repetition of the sounds of Eurydice's name in Georg. 4. Pandey comments on the links between Aen. 2.469–558 and Ovid, Metam. 1.452–567.

Wasył, Anna Maria. 2018. Alcestis barcelońska oraz centon Alcesta: późnoantyczne spojrzenie na mit i gatunek. Kraków.

In composing his Cento nuptialis, writes Budaragina, Ausonius allows himself to borrow a maximum of one and a half contiguous lines from Vergil's text. The text at praef. 26–27 is thus seriously corrupt and should be marked with a crux: “unus † et sequens cum medio ...”. The Cento Tityri edited by Canellis is an erudite Christian eclogue based on Vergil's verse, put in the form of a dialogue and drawing on various genres. Clément-Tarantino and Klein write that the cento Europa uses fragments of Vergil's verse but derives its subject matter from Ovid, Metam. 2. It thus paradoxically represents a Vergilian rereading of Ovid. Fels and Greschat offer a translation of and commentary on Proba's Cento. Kochenash suggests that the mention of Tabitha at Acts 9.36–43 immediately after Peter's healing of Aeneas can be read as an allusion to Vergil's Dido, since Aramaic Tabitha and Greek Dorcas (the translation of her name) both mean “deer” and Dido is characterized as a deer in the Aeneid. Marin (2017b) observes that Jerome, Epist. 30.13.2, alludes to Georg. 2.506. Tautschnig discusses Seneca's allusion in his Epist. 21 to the Nisus and Euryalus episode. Vallat analyzes a database of Vergilian centones to discover which passages were best known in late antiquity, and offers in an appendix a list of the Vergilian verses cited three or more times. Wasył's edition includes the Latin text of two poems preserved in Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France, MS lat. 10318. The cento Alcestis, inspired by Vergil, bears witness to literary production in North Africa under the Vandals.

Weiss, Philipp. 2017. Homer und Vergil im Vergleich: ein Paradigma antiker Literaturkritik und seine Ästhetik. Classica Monacensia 52. Tübingen.

Fratantuono argues that Catullus’s concern with the transition from a Trojan past to an Italian present is typified by the relationship between the Italian Diana and the Trojan Cybele, and that aspects of this relationship influenced the “closing movements” of the Aeneid. Freudenburg discusses Vergil’s Roman transformation of a Homeric passage (Od. 2.1–14) at Aen. 8.454–68. Milo analyzes the influence of Homer, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Apollonius Rhodius on Vergil’s tale of Dido. Musio compares the structure and content of the Aeneid with that of Cicero’s De republica.

Clément-Tarantino observes that Servius's explication of myth is always subordinated to the need to explain Vergil's text. Isaenko comments on Macrobius's and Servius's remarks on Aen. 2.351–52. Stok and Ramires suggest that the interpolated text transmitted in Servius's commentary at Ecl. 1.37–2.10 derives from the Explanatio, an anthology composed perhaps at the time of the abbot Adamán in the monastery of Ionia, and was inserted into the text in the ninth century. Tischer comments on an anecdote preserved in Servius's commentary on Ecl. 6.11 describing a meeting between Cicero and Vergil in which Cicero praised Vergil, praise that Vergil later took up at Aen. 12.168. Ziogas observes that Suetonius's story of Octavia's grieving reaction to Vergil's recitation of Aen. 6.882–86 creates an interplay between the characters of the Aeneid and its external audiences, "and that is why its continuing influence on how we read Vergil is significant—the transhistorical appeal of the vitae outweighs their dubious historicity" (436).

Ammirati provides a palaeographical and codicological description of a bifolium, Urbana-Champaign, William R. and Clarice V. Spurlock Museum, inv. 1931.20.002, the only extant evidence of a text of Vergil (Aen. 3.136–77, 191–232, 246–87, 301–42) copied in Rome in Romanesca Carolingian minuscule, with numerous interlinear and marginal glosses. Berti offers an extensive review of E. Kraggerud, Vergiliana (2016). Delvigo discusses the earliest defensores and obtretractores of Vergil’s text. Fressura investigates the circumstances under which fols. 115–16 of Milan, Biblioteca Ambrosiana di Milano, MS L 120, were lost. The bifolium was a palimpsest containing, in its scriptio inferior, a portion of the Aeneid with a Greek translation datable to the sixth century. Hendrickson writes on ancient books purporting to be autograph manuscripts by Vergil. Luzzatto argues that the reading Diomedes attested at Aen. 11.243 in the older manuscripts and in Servius's and Macrobius's commentaries is not an error but testifies to the original spelling of an Augustan edition. Pecere dates Florence, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana, MS Plut. 39.1 to the last years of the fifth or beginning of the sixth century. Scappaticcio (2016) considers the papyrological evidence for the circulation of the Aeneid from the first through sixth centuries. Scappaticcio (2017) writes that in Egypt the widespread study of Latin as a second language is already observable in papyri of the first century BC, where Vergil's work especially was considered suitable for exercitationes scribendi. Schafer argues that the Eclogues and Georgics can meaningfully be considered in terms of columns of script (paginae), 36 lines per column for the former and 40 for the latter; the text mimetically comments on its column breaks. Shumilin proposes reading longe in place of the transmitted longa at Aen. 12.510, comparing Il. 20.460–62 and Statius, Theb. 9.108.

Álvaro finds an allusion to Aen. 11.87 in Carm. 29.73 by Theodulf of Orléans (ca. 750–821). Burek discusses Lazamon's Brut, "a thirteenth-century Middle English translation of Wace's Roman de Brut (itself a translation of Geoffrey of Monmouth's Historia regum Britanniae)" (1), in which she finds direct allusions to the Aeneid's plot and characters as part of a broader commentary on Arthur's kingship. Smolak writes about the medieval Christianization of Vergil and Ovid that was accomplished through forging new texts under their names.

Johnson observes that Gavin Douglas (ca. 1476–1522) regarded himself as a philological humanist "following in the footsteps of Laurentius Valla." Yet Douglas's reliance on Christian commentary in his translation of Vergil's Aeneid, his Christianizing of his pagan source, and his textual attentiveness "show not only affinities with the late medieval tradition of learned translation but also with the high-order humanism of a scholastic literary sensibility" (71). Laird reflects on the late antique constructions of Vergil's character, which led to a more vivid impression of his presence, and on the reception of this tradition with its implicit tensions in early modern authors, such as Petrarch. Lanzarone offers observations on the unpublished commentary by the Italian scholar Giulio Pomponio Leto (ca. 1428–98) on the Appendix Vergiliana. The commentary contains antiquarian, geographical, historical, and mythological notes. Maronese focuses especially on Dante. Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini's choice of the name Pius when he was elected pope in 1458, thereby becoming Pope Pius II, raises questions about his reception of Vergil, Stok writes. Cristoforo Landino (1424–98) is the subject of Taufer's study. Whittington discusses the "thirteenth book of the Aeneid" composed by the Italian humanist Maffeo Vegio (1407–58).

- Heiny, Stephen. 2018. “Puny in My Predicaments’: Seamus Heaney’s Readings of Virgil’s Ninth Eclogue.” Vergilius 64: 53–70.

Formicola speculates that Charles Frazier (1950–) may have been influenced by Vergil’s labor omnia vicit improbus et duris urgens in rebus egestas (Georg. 1.121–22) in writing his novel Cold Mountain, pointing the way to a new Golden Age after the horrors of civil war.

Coffee uses digital methods to address “the phenomenon of ‘viral intertextuality,’ or instances of distinct language that appear serially over multiple literary works” (177), using as his example Vergil’s description of Lavinia’s blush at Aen. 12, 67–69. In so doing he discovers “instances where the phrase seems to pass beyond the realm of poetic imitation, or even generic language, to become a constellation of ideas and images that float free into the thought-world drawn on by later poets and even prose authors. Considering this wide swath of textual relationships together brings us to a model of intertextuality different from the common one” (178). Gurd analyzes Xenotext One (2015), a collection of poems and theoretical statements by Christian Bök, which contains a translation of Georg. 1.

Nolfo is concerned with a Latin epigram, wrongly attributed to Ausonius and preserved in the fourth- or fifth-century Epigrammata Bobiensia, which translates a Greek epigram (AP 151) that presents itself as a first-person utterance by an artistic image of Dido. Pavan discusses the gallery of paintings by various artists of the baroque era illustrating scenes from the Aeneid collected in the Palazzo Buonaccorsi. Putnam interprets Pietro da Cortona’s baroque frescoes, depicting figures from the Aeneid, created between 1651–55 for the Palazzo Pamphilj on the Piazza Navona in Rome. Scalera writes about the seventeenth-century tragicomic opera Dido by the librettist Giovanni Francesco Busenello (1598–1659) and composer Francesco Cavalli (1602–76), which ends with a wedding between Dido and Iarbas. Torre gives an overview of Italian versions of the Aeneid published in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and of their illustrations, which can be considered a source for the artistic imagery on display in the Palazzo Bonaccorsi.
