Casali and Stok consider "within a loose historical framework some significant moments in the history of Virgil commentaries: the transition from late antiquity to the Middle Ages, when the fifth-century commentary of Philargyrius on the Eclogues and Georgics was excerpted to produce an interpretation that would appeal to Christian sensitivities; and the ‘beginning’ and ‘end’ of the Renaissance tradition of Virgil commentaries, with the fifteenth-century commentary of Pomponius Laetus, which could be viewed as the first modern Virgil commentary; before turning finally to Juan Luis de la Cerda, a Spanish Jesuit who, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, laid the foundations of the tradition of Virgil commentaries still alive today” (95). The commonplace ancient and modern conceit that a Latin poet “assumed a literary identity” as his Greek model’s Roman equivalent,” Farrell writes, means that “a useful way to approach Virgil’s intertextual poetics is ... through the concept of persona” (299). Formicola gives a substantive review of Nicholas Horsfall’s Virgil, Aeneid 6 (2013). Mac Góráin and Martindale’s companion (which was listed only by title in last year’s Vergilian Bibliography) is the second edition of Martindale 1997. All contributions, with one exception, have been updated, and all supplemented with new bibliography that has an international and less anglophone emphasis. Nine new chapters are included. Martindale’s introduction to the revised Cambridge Companion considers the cultural significance of Vergil within the Western tradition. Theodorakopoulos uses career criticism as a theoretical approach in understanding the relation of Vergil’s life to his works.

Braund writes on English translations of the Aeneid by Thomas Twyne (1543–1613) and Thomas Phaer (c. 1510–60). Cesila focuses on the Portuguese translation by Manuel Odorico Mendes (1799–1864) of several Vergilian passages. Dugaz considers the translation of the Aeneid by the churchman and poet Octovien de Saint-Gelais (1468–1502) into French. Moya del Baño draws attention to the almost unknown translations of Horace (1899), Vergil (1903), Catullus (1905), and Tibullus (1905) by the Mexican writer Joaquín D. Casasús (1858–1916). Silva 2019a and 2019b offer an introduction, notes, and translation into Portuguese of the Eclogues and Georgics. Vidal writes about the translation of Vergil's Eclogues into Castilian by the humanist Fray Luis de León (1528–91).

Franklinos offers textual notes on Catalepton 10.9–11, 20–21, and 22. Kayachev 2013 emends et to est at Ciris 79 and omits est at the end of the line; at Ciris 80 he adds ut after circum. Kayachev 2018a emends caeli to taciti at Ciris 218; Kayachev 2018b emends Moretum 70, transmitted as vicinosque apte cura summittere rivos, to vicinosque apte cultis inducere rivos; and Kayachev 2019 draws a connection between Ovid, Metam. 10.311 and Ciris 156. La Barbera 2019a discusses editors’ suggestions for emendation of et laeta at Culex 140 and recommends the emendations seque ipsae extendunt at 143 and non inscia fati at 145. La Barbera 2019b emends cubuere at Culex 154 to accubuere; and at 156 suggests pergit for the transmitted poscit and, more tentatively, susurranti vento for the transmitted susurrantis venti. Payne describes a weakness in New Materialism by focusing on the Aetna and on the account by Friedrich von Schiller (1759–1805) of the modalities of subjectification. Verde suggests that Theophrastus is one of the most significant sources of the pseudo-Vergilian Aetna.

Aubert argues that law is a structural element in the Aeneid, in that the foundation of Rome is understood both as a material phenomenon, involving organization of the urban space, and as an ideal phenomenon, involving regulation of the civitas. Curtis's book includes chapters on "Virgil's Aeneid and the Relocation of Ritual" and "Foundational Choreography in the Aeneid." Fowler's 1997 contribution on Vergilian narrative is revised and updated by Barchiesi. Haudry discerns Indo-European motifs in the Aeneid. Tar suggests that an analysis of allegorical interpretations of myths from antiquity to the present shows Vergil to be a creator, not merely a manipulator, of myths. Thomas, observing that the place of the sublime in the Roman imaginary deserves to be recognized, finds that the characters in the Aeneid who participate in the sublime are found in two registers: that of tragedy and that of epic.

Gee explores the journey of the soul in the afterlife in terms of the imaginary time-space zone of the other world, with a focus on the writings of Freud and Aen. 6. Morgan shows how Vergil “guides his reader’s response to Aeneas’ stay in Carthage.” It “hinges on a single word in Aeneid Book 4,” namely laena at 4.262.

- Wimperis, Tedd A. 2020. “Turnus’s ‘Tota Italia’: Italian Solidarity and Political Rhetoric in Aeneid 7–12.” TAPA 150:143–79.

Masselli remarks on the ambiguity of externus in Aen. 7.354–79, which may refer to Turnus, not Aeneas. Morgan writes that Claudian’s combination of the divine council with the Vergilian motif of hellish forces was anticipated by Lucilius, which was itself a response to Ennius. Vergil’s council at Aen. 10.1–117 combines the epic and satiric models, with their diametrically opposed characters.

Casali sees the contradictions in the genealogies of Laurentian kings at Aen. 7.45–49, 7.177–91, and 8.313–36 as reflections of the political and cultural interests of the different characters involved. Estefanía observes that, although many readers and Aeneas himself interpret the decorations in the temple of Juno showing scenes of the Trojan War as a sign of compassion for the Trojans, the context of the decorations points to a darker interpretation. Pitcher discusses the implications for his character of Aen. 10.824, et mentem patriae subiit pietatis imago, in the scene in which Aeneas addresses the dying Lausus. Stamone demonstrates the ways in which Christian authors from the fourth century AD to the modern era have shaped the image of Mary with reference to the vocabulary Vergil used to shape his Venus-as-virgin.

Mac Góráin takes as his starting point the observation that, “in light of Augustus’ act of appropriation” in demanding (according to the biographical tradition) that the Aeneid be published, “it is difficult to separate the power dynamics within the narrative of the Aeneid from the discourses of power and authority in triumviral and Augustan Rome.” Paladini hypothesizes that the garden evoked in Georg. 4.116–48 can be identified with the horti of Maecenas. Zetzel considers Vergil’s treatment of archaic Roman history in the Aeneid.

Fedeli argues that the Vergilius mentioned in Horace, Carm. 4.12 is not the poet. Scarcia shows how Ovid in Trist. 3.14.19–24 reworks the narrative of the last moments of Vergil's life into a narrative of his own life in exile.

Adkin 2016a argues that the acrostic cacata at Ecl. 4.47–52 is compatible with Vergil's deliberate use of undignified acrostics on other occasions to subvert political panegyric. Moul offers close readings of several Vergilian passages, accompanied by a variety of English translations that are themselves set alongside other extracts of English verse. Putnam puts forth reasons to take aurea as a nominative modifying Dido rather than as an example of synzesis attached to sponda, the usual interpretation.

De Gianni considers the Christian responses to Aen. 2.57–64 by Iuvencus, Proba, and the anonymous author of De ecclesia. Elsner writes about the late Latin Narcissus cento, a sixteen-line poem created from elements supplied by Vergil. Feldherr considers Ovid's appropriation in Metam. 10 of Vergil's Orpheus. Fielding observes that the poems composed by Paulinus of Nola (AD 354–431) for the Feast of Saint Felix in Cimitile evoke modes of popular entertainment and took Vergil's Eclogues as a model for the rustic poetics of his work. Gilski writes (in Polish) about the Homeric and Vergilian centones, including the Cento Probae. Hejduk compares Aen. 2.614–28 and Lucan 1.62–70. Peirano Garrison's monograph contains a chapter "Non minus orator quam poeta': Virgil the Orator in Late Antiquity." Sághy writes about the Christianization of Vergil's works in epigrams by Pope Damasus (AD 305–84). Tesoriero writes about the discrepancy between the knowledge of Lucan's readers, who knew the Aeneid, and Caesar's reaction in Lucan's poem when he sees the ruins of Troy. Trevizam comments on the intertextual relationship between Nemesianus's Cynegetica 243–50 and Georg. 3.

Cianciosi's dissertation (in English) compares Vergil's poetry to that of his predecessors and suggests that he was aware of the criticism we find in the Homeric and Theocritean scholia.

Boldrer defends the authenticity of Servius’s testimony at Ecl. 6.11 for a meeting between Cicero and Vergil on the occasion of the theatrical performance of that eclogue. Deloince-Louette compares the views of the French humanist Jean de Sponde (1557–95), the Spanish theologian Juan Luis de la Cerda (1558–1643), and the French poet Jacques Peletier (1517–82) concerning Vergil’s relationship to Homer. Foster’s focus is late Roman education and the ways in which students from different cultural and religious backgrounds were trained to read Vergil’s multifaceted narrative. Fowler’s 1997 contribution on Servius’s commentary is revised and updated by Casali and Stok. Guillaumin offers an edition, translation into French, and commentary on Servius, Aen. 4. Peraki-Kyriakidou offers an analysis of Servius’s translation practice and his use of the term translatio, which can refer to metaphor and to etymology. Ramires is concerned with Servius’s interpretation of Aen. 4.30.

Fressura publishes a first edition, with codicological and palaeographic commentary, of P. Vindob. L 158 b, containing passages from Vergil's Aeneid. Gervais argues that Vergil wrote at pius Aeneas sacris iam rite solutis at Aen. 7.5 and that exsequiis is an intrusive gloss. Kraggerud comments on Ecl. 3.100–102, Ecl. 4.60–63, Georg. 2.22 and 266–68, and Aen. 9.462–64. Morales Bernal attempts to discover the date of the first edition of the Aeneid published in Spain, that of the fifteenth-century Catalan printer Gabriel Pou in Barcelona. Tallercio 2019 favors the reading ducente deo at Aen. 2.632, comparing Horace, Carm. 4.4. Uría concludes (228), “[I]t can be assumed that a variant reading uolunt in Aen. 1.150 was either read or suggested as an alternative to uolant during the early years of Virgilian textual criticism.”

Bideau writes about the Middle High German poet Heinrich von Veldeke (born c. 1140–50, near Maastricht; died c. 1190), whose Eneit (or Eneide) was based on the Old French Roman d’Eneas. Burrow considers “renovations” of Vergil across a long period, beginning from a medieval perspective. Cormier writes about the Roman d’Eneas. Kertz analyzes the use of Vergilian ekphrasis in Chaucer and in the Gawain poet. Lagomarsini discusses the first Italian prose translations of the Aeneid by Andrea Lancia (1296–1357) and Ciampolo Ugurgieri (fl. c. 1313–15), comparing them with the Old French Roman d’Eneas. Mierke writes about Vergilian influence on the medieval literary genre of Sangspruchdichtung, on the prose work Indulgentiae ecclesiarum urbis Romae, and on the guidebook Mirabilia urbis Romae. Mora is concerned with the work of Bernardus Silvestris (fl. 1147–48). Rodríguez Mesa considers the influence of Vergil on Petrarch (1304–74).

Benedetti writes about Vergilian intertextuality in the epic poem Gerusalemme liberata by Torquato Tasso (1544–95). Casanova-Robin discusses the symbolic and philosophical approaches applied by the Italian Cristoforo Landino (1424–98) to Vergil in his Praefatio in Virgilio, Disputationes Camaldulenses, and P. Vergilii Maronis Opera Interpretationes. Kallendorf 2018 demonstrates that the early printed editions of Vergil shaped the place of his minor works in the canon of classical authors in the Renaissance. Kallendorf 2019 is concerned with the reception of the Vergil commentary by Philipp Melanchthon (1497–1560). Paolucci considers the parody in the Poetics by Julius Caesar Scaliger (1484–1558) of Catalepton 10, itself a parody of Catullus 4. Potter and Cuthbertson endorse the argument that Dido, Queen of Carthage, by Christopher Marlowe (1564–93), should be regarded as the only extensive exploration of a pessimistic reading of the Aeneid from the English Renaissance. Río Torres-Murciano analyzes Vergilian influence on the Mexican historian Antonio de Saavedra Guzmán (sixteenth-century author of El peregrino indiano), Francisco de Terrazas (1525–1600, author of Nuevo Mundo y Conquista), and the Spanish writer Luis Zapata de Chaves (1526–95, author of El Carlo famoso). Usher is concerned with Vergilian influence on the work of the Franciscan priest André Thevet (c. 1503–92).

Adkins discusses the influence of Dido on the figure of Eve in the work of John Milton (1608–74). Vergilian influence on the Canadian author Marc Lescarbot (c. 1570–1641) is the subject of Barton's study. Consolino compares and contrasts Vergilian centones written in the seventeenth century with late antique centones. De Caigny studies the prose (1649, 1662) and verse (1673) translations of Vergil by the abbot Michel de Morales (1600–1681), which were accompanied by commentary and theoretical remarks. Goyet 2019a offers an edition and translation into French of the commentary of the Italian printer Marco Antonio Ferrazzi (1661–1748) on Aen. 1.37–49 and 1.65–75. Goyet 2019b discusses rhetorical commentaries on Juno's plea to Aeolus in Aen. 1, from those of Servius and Donatus to those of Marco Antonio Ferrazzi, the Spanish theologian Juan Luis de la Cerda (1558–1643), and others. Moog writes about Vergilian influences in the tale La Barbe bleue by the French writer Charles Perrault (1628–1703). Schoenberger discusses the poems of John Dryden (1631–1700), Anne Finch (1661–1720), and Andrew Marvell (1621–1678). Sirchich Von Kis-Sira writes about the commentary by Juan Luis de la Cerda on Aen. 1.

Pagliara reviews numerous works of literature and art from the sixteenth to the nineteenth centuries that treat the myth of Aeneas, including that of the Italian philologist Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837), who saw the Trojans' integration into the native Italian population as an example of humanitas.

Kennedy, Duncan F. 2019. "Modern Receptions and Their Interpretative Implications: The Case of T. S. Eliot." In Mac Góráin and Martindale, 23–42.

Cox writes about The Death of Virgil (1946) by the Austrian Jewish writer Hermann Broch (1886–1951) and the circumstances under which it was written, judging that it seems no exaggeration to say that this novel “is the twentieth century’s most important response to Virgil” (470).

Schier, Rudolf. 2019. “Is Giorgione’s ‘Inferno with Aeneas and Anchises’ Really Lost?” Vergilius 65:61–98.

Coombe suggests that the artistic ekphrases at Aen. 1.446–93, 6.14–36, and 10.495–500 are crucial to the reader’s interpretation of Vergil’s narrative and that each ekphrasis serves as a synecdoche for the whole. Hamm discusses the woodcuts illustrating the Aeneid by the German humanist and satirist Sebastian Brant (1457–1521). Schier puts forth reasons for believing that, although the painting known as Inferno with Aeneas and Anchises by the Venetian Giorgione (1478–1510) was believed to have been lost, his Il Tramonto is in fact this painting.
